Bonfire of the 'Vanities'

THREE GALS OWN THE STAGE IN THEATREWORKS' LATEST MUSICAL — AND GET ALONG ANYWAY

By Rebecca Wallace

When you've got a theater musical with a cast consisting only of three dynamic women, you might expect some stage-hogging.

But the three cast members of "Vanities," which had its world premiere at TheatreWorks on June 21, apparently get along like a house on fire. The Broadway actresses have become inseparable, even moving into the same apartment for the duration.

"From day one of this rehearsal process, the three of us, we just clicked," Megan Hilty said of her new roommates, Leslie Kritzer and Sarah Stiles.

Director Gordon Greenberg marvels. "I've never seen anything like it."

It's a show where chemistry comes in handy. "Vanities," a musical version of the long-running stage play by Jack Heifner, follows three girls from a small town in Texas as they grow from teens to adults.

They start as peppy 17-year-olds. The opening number has them at their mirrors primping for school, singing "a love song to themselves," as Greenberg puts it.

Composer David Kirshenbaum said he wanted a song that depicts the trio not as self-absorbed but as products of their time. They're early-'60s girls with their sense of self-worth tied up in their looks, he says — and they have no idea of the societal turbulence to come.

"Their world expands from era to era, from 'it's all about the pep rally' to 'it's all about the sorority' to 'it's all about the cosmos,'" Greenberg said.

The years from the early '60s to the early '70s have been well mined in theater, books, movies and song. What makes this show stand out, says Greenberg, is the characters: They're pioneering depictions of feisty Southern females. "Vanities" ran off-Broadway from 1976 to 1981, well before the "Designing Women" came to television and the "Steel Magnolias" took the stage and screen.

"We now understand the saucy Southern woman in all her glory," Greenberg said.

The rebellious character of Mary is a turn-around for Hilty, who said, "I'm normally cast as a good girl." Indeed. She just finished playing the good witch Glinda in the Broadway production of "Wicked."

Meanwhile, Stiles, who has appeared on Broadway in "The 25th Annual Putnam County Spelling Bee," plays Joanne, a woman clinging to a picture of how she thought her life would be.

Kritzer, whose credits include "Hairspray" and "Urinetown," has the role of Kathy, who learns to go with the flow.

"She has a plan, but things fall apart and she recognizes that,"

Do you sweat too much?

You may be one of the nearly 8 million Americans who suffers from hyperhidrosis, excessive sweating of the underarms, hands or feet.

Please call for a free brochure or more information 650.988.7557

Hyperhidrosis of the underarms can be treated with OTC antiperspirants or we can provide a more potent prescription antiperspirant with special instructions. If that treatment is unsuccessful, Botox® can be a safe, simple and effective alternative. The amount of sweat is reduced by 92% at 2 weeks after Botox treatment and lasts 7 to 16 months. This treatment can be done in our office and takes less than an hour.

Hyperhidrosis of the hands and feet is best treated with iontophoresis, a procedure using a special water bath that conducts mild electrical current. The treatment also can be done in our office and takes less than an hour. It must be done every other day for the first 6 to 10 treatments but then the intervals can usually be extended and it can be done at home. When used correctly, it has a high success rate. —By Janet H. Pulskamp, M.D.

Power play

IN 'DEUCE,' PLAYWRIGHT EXPLORES THE LOVE AND POWER FOUND IN HUMAN RELATIONSHIPS

By Kevin Kirby

When "Deuce" received its world premiere on June 23 at Mountain View's Pear Avenue Theatre, it was the culmination of countless hours of work by dozens of individuals. The show's director, producer, actors, designers and stage crew had been laboring for months to bring this play to life.

None of them, though, worked on the show as long as Sharmon Hilfinger.

Hilfinger is the show's playwright, and she has been fashioning the script for "Deuce" since late 2003. The impulse that launched this nearly three-year effort was Hilfinger's desire to explore "issues of love and power in relationships." In "Deuce," she has created a relationship between an older, successful woman and a young man who is still conflicted about his life goals, thus turning the usual power equation (older man/younger woman) upside down.

Hilfinger, a Palo Alto resident, has been writing plays for 20 years and has been an organizer of the Pear Playwrights' Guild — a group in which playwrights receive advice and critiques from their peers — since its inception. Nonetheless, she says each play is a new learning experience.

Take "Deuce," for example. The story concerns a female academician writing a biography of her recently deceased mentor. Her research brings her into close contact with the late professor's son, and, as the details of the professor's life unfold, the two of them uncover a number of secrets.

The play is structured as a mystery. This is a departure from Hilfinger's previous musicals and romantic comedies, and she has had to learn a new set of storytelling skills. Information must be doled out incrementally in order to propel the story forward.

"One of the challenges has been how to make the revelation of this information dramatic ... without hitting the audience over the head with a sledgehammer," she said.

This is also the first of Hilfinger's full-length plays in which all the action occurs in a single location. This limitation has forced her to delve deep into the characters and to find creative solutions for "how to keep the action on stage." She speaks admiringly of Tennessee Williams' ability to spin a compelling drama out of two characters in a single room on a single afternoon.

Theater being a collaborative art form, Hilfinger has had help from many quarters. She is especially grateful to have had the opportunity, in late 2005 and early 2006, to workshop the play at the Encore Theatre in San Francisco.

Encore's artistic director, Lisa Steindler, organized six sessions over a two-month period in which experienced actors rehearsed, discussed, and improvised around the text.

By allowing Hilfinger to see the play "on its feet," the workshops suggested directions for revision and expansion. "Having time to muck around with [a script]," she said, "really pushes it forward."

Hilfinger is also grateful that Ann Kuchins, director of the Pear's production, has been with the project since the workshop phase, as has actress Denise Balthrop Cassidy, who plays the academician.

Transcending borders

MEXICAN-AMERICAN PERSPECTIVE IN MANUEL SANTANA'S PAINTINGS

By Molly Tanenbaum

Stepping into the world of Manuel Santana is like entering a dream. Or a nightmare.

Behind the popping, luminescent color of flowers and poets can lurk shadowy blue faces and snarling white dogs.

In the most startling painting, "El Paseo," one such growling canine looks poised to pounce off the canvas and right at someone's jugular. The crazed dog's sharp movement against is haunting against a fiery, dark background.

But most of Santana's vibrant paintings and black and white lithographs currently on display at the Community School of Music and Arts are more palatable for the faint of heart.

From simple flower patterns and engraved depictions of carnival-like characters to anti-war statements, Santana sets a mood that is often fanciful, and sometimes frightening.

Santana, 79, was born in Los Angeles to Mexican immigrants, and is both good-humored and gruff. Throughout his life, he spent much time on both sides of the border—his family resides in Aguascalientes—and his art has done the same. Each piece bears a bilingual title, and his flowers, as well as his vibrant palette, are reminiscent of Mexican artwork.

With a bicultural upbringing, Santana is particularly attuned to the differences between Mexico and the United States, which emerge when Mexicans and Americans respond to his art.

"Here, culture is going to a museum. In Mexico, culture is the sum total of human history," Santana said.

The main principle in Santana's art, and in his worldview, is chaos. He rarely has a plan when he begins a painting or an etching — he begins each canvas naïve and curious. But slowly, through creating lines and circles and fields of bright color, he begins to find his way.

"Little by little, something begins to suggest itself. It's process, constant process. The only way you can understand it is to get pieces of it," Santana said.

"It makes you realize the only real power you have is to accept the fact that you don't know everything."

In his paintings and wood cuts, Santana plays with texture. Smoothed swirls of acrylic paint interrupt raised, knobby portions of the canvas, causing the viewer to see different things depending on the angle. He'll experiment with a drill for his wood cuts, or xilographs, losing the control of familiar tools to discover a new form of chaos.

"The Gran Victoria" by Manuel Santana, acrylic on canvas, 2003, 48" x 36"

In this way, he learns constantly.

Santana became an artist almost by accident. He was in his early thirties taking classes and a psychology teacher saw his drawings and encouraged him to enroll in an art class, and then in art school for two years. There, Santana experimented with various media and had the opportunity to work with experienced painters.

After a 30-year hiatus during which Santana worked in construction and opened up Manuel's, a Mexican restaurant in Aptos, he returned to art 15 years ago and focused on painting.

"I didn't have any style when I quit," he said. "I was just learning how to do things. I just decided that since I was already in my 60s, I would forget about being a great artist and just started investigating everything I wanted to know about art."

Most of the paintings and xilographs on display in the Mohr Gallery are from the past few years. A 1993 painting, "Dos Poetas," showcases Santana's ability to contrast bright hues with dark emotions to render a complex effect. His two poets are men with large, round eyes, huddled together almost as one person. Their gazes are identical and grave.

Instead of letting the color mirror the poets' solemn expressions, Santana fills the canvas with a prism of neon warmth. Colors reflect and bounce off one other, camouflaging the two pensive men in their surroundings.

At least one of these men is Santana. ▀

DEUCE

The production of "Deuce" is just the latest chapter in Hilfinger's four-year association with the Pear Avenue Theatre.

Hilfinger was one of the volunteers who helped turn a white warehouse space into a black box theater in June of 2002, and it was on that day that the Pear Playwrights' Guild was conceived. "Several of the people who came to help paint had been taking playwriting classes," Pear founder Diane Tasca recalled, "and they started talking about ... forming their own group."

The idea fit well with Tasca's vision for the Pear. "When the Pear began, one of our main objectives was to encourage new playwrights" by staging original works by Bay Area writers, she said. Since the theater opened its doors in 2003, more than a third of its shows have been new works — including several by members of the Pear's playwrighting group.

Writing, in Hilfinger's words, is a "very private" activity. She feels that only recently has the Pear Playwrights' Guild solidified into a truly cohesive entity, one in which the writers feel safe to discuss the writing process and share half-finished work unself-consciously.

According to Tasca, Hilfinger has contributed "great intelligence, tact, and open-heartedness" to building the group, and often encourages new members to join.

As for "Deuce," Tasca is excited to be producing a full-length work by Hilfinger, a work that she describes as "both witty and heartfelt."

She added, "We think that our audiences will be caught up as we were." ▣

VANITIES

Hilty said. "She tries to get us to see there's more to life than we thought."

In its original incarnation, "Vanities" was one of the longest running off-Broadway plays, and the one in which Kathy Bates made her off-Broadway debut. It was made into a TV movie in 1981.

Greenberg and Kirshenbaum had long been fans of the play, and Greenberg ultimately contacted author Heifner, who agreed to adapt his play into the book for the musical.

This proved a fruitful collaboration. When Kirshenbaum writes a score, he generally finds lyrics more difficult to create than music. This time was different: He literally had the voice of the play as a guide.

"It was great working with Jack," he said. "He lived through the time period, and I talked to him about growing up in Texas in the '60s. Just listening to him talk [helped]; he has a little accent and all these colloquialisms."

To help mold the show's sound, Kirshenbaum also surrounded himself with music from the period: Carole King, the Supremes, Jimi Hendrix. He ended up with 12 original songs, which is played during the show by an eight-piece band.

The other piece of the creative process was TheatreWorks itself. Up until last October, the "Vanities" creators had about half of it written. Then they came out from New York for an intensive one-week workshop.

TheatreWorks organized the workshop and provided help in several ways, including hiring actors to read from the script-in-progress and offering feedback from founding artistic director Robert Kelley. "Vanities" took shape.

"It happened fast. It was inspired by the process and by being here," Greenberg said.

Greenberg and Kirshenbaum said TheatreWorks has built a strong reputation in the New York theater world as a fertile place to develop new musicals, through its writers' retreats and New Works Initiative.

Kirshenbaum has worked with TheatreWorks several times, including writing the score for "Summer of '42," which debuted there in 2001 before heading off-Broadway.

His favorite experience was during a writers' retreat a few years ago, when he realized one of his cohorts was Tom Jones, the librettist of the classic, "The Fantasticks." Jones was writing a musical version of the movie "Harold and Maude," which premiered at TheatreWorks last year. Kirshenbaum was starstruck.

"It just killed me that Tom Jones was here like one of the kids, writing a new show," he said. ■
