ExpressNets extends reach of Google WiFi

BUSINESS IS BOOMING FOR LOCAL COMPANY AFTER WIRELESS DEBUT

By Daniel DeBolt

Inside his small, subsidized apartment, Clem Ling studies charts and graphs, all in an effort to predict the stock market, bond rates and currency rates. On the walls around Ling's desk are notes with words like "factorization." Ling hopes to make some real money this way, but right now he is living off Social Security and savings.

For Ling, every dollar is essential. He receives a paltry Social Security check every month that comes $20 short of paying his rent. With finances this tight, spending $25 a month on DSL is a big deal.

That's why no one is more grateful than Ling for the free wireless Internet connection offered by Google. With no family, Ling uses the Internet as a main connection to the world and a major tool in his work. But there's a catch: The free WiFi is mainly built for outdoor use. It doesn't reach into private residences without the help of a small device called a WiFi modem.

MICHAEL MULLADY

The WiFi modem

Enter local Internet technology company ExpressNets, which was happy to help Ling get Google's free wireless signal into his home last week in a small act of charity.

"It's terrific," Ling said. Whether or not Google WiFi will work for Ling depends on three things, said Leo Wandling, ExpressNets network engineer: How far he is from a node, how many trees are in the way, and how much radio interference there is between his home and the nearest node. Google has installed 380 nodes on light poles around the city.

Wandling took on the project for Ling because he does IT work for the Community Services Agency, a local charitable nonprofit that works with Ling.

"I said, 'Give me somebody who really needs help,'" Wandling said.

ExpressNets specializes in selling and installing modems that help people get Google's WiFi signal into their homes. Since the network went public Aug. 16, ExpressNets' business has jumped by 70 percent, Wandling said. The 12-employee company may quickly grow, and is planning to start leasing a new office across the street from Google.

Wandling is a busy man these days. The Voice caught up with him to watch him

BROADER PATENTS COST MORE TO LITIGATE — WHICH IS THE POINT FOR BIG BUSINESS

By M. E. "Gene" Cavanaugh

Last month, I wrote about two types of patents, so-called defensive, or "broad" patents, and offensive, or "Jepson," patents — the former being better suited to large companies, the latter to small inventors. What are the specifics of these two diametrically opposed patents?

First of all, it's important to note that patents are a business strategy. And in business, the first thing to consider is, "What are our strengths and weaknesses?"

For large companies, the primary strength is money. If a large company can maneuver someone smaller into a spending match, the large company will win. This says nothing about merits, or who should win, only that the Golden Rule of business applies: "He with the gold wins."

The way to fight this fight is with a defensive or "broadened" patent. "Broadened" does not imply a patent that "covers" more. Quite the opposite — the broader the patent, the less it is likely to cover. In effect, the broad patent is very expensive, and reduces the number of possible opponents.

Here's how it works: A defensive or broad patent is written in a general way. For example, a "wheel" becomes a "rotatively supporting member" or some such. In theory, this covers more than "wheel" — that is, in theory, it "claims more." This can have the effect of requiring extensive interpretation by expert witnesses, often at thousands of dollars per hour. Also, as attorneys, we have a duty to represent the client to the best of our abilities, and for a wealthy client, broad patents, potentially costing millions to litigate, are in the best interests of the client, because the client is less likely to be challenged in court because of the expense.

For the Jepson patent, the strategy is exactly opposite. Here we want to minimize the cost of patenting, make litigation unattractive to potential rivals, and, if litigation becomes necessary, we want to win with the least possible expense. That last consideration alone says we need to avoid the need for experts and for "specialty" attorneys. (Yes, there are attorneys that specialize in the interpretation of broad patents.)

The Jepson patent is written for clarity. The best Jepson patent is short and to the point, with brief, simple claims and clear, unambiguous language. Although the claims become even harder to write, and really do require an attorney with knowledge of the case law, the overall patent is much less expensive. Further, a properly written Jepson claim can be easily understood by a qualified judge, even one who does not specialize in intellectual property.

Since claims are interpreted only by judges, and since judges generally do not like the use of experts if they can be avoided, we can do away with the jury, expensive experts, and specialized attorneys. It is amazing how fast and far the expense involved drops!

Even a small entity — for example the small, individual inventor — will generally find the expense of litigation reasonable. This explains why litigation is unlikely; if the small entity can afford it, and the patent is "clear on its face," litigation may become pointless.

From my personal view, and apparently the view of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, small inventors are the real machine driving true innovation in this country. Most large entities, while they may do a marvelous job of optimizing what is already known, have little incentive to endanger their business with truly new, untried technology, and they tend to discourage such risks. Small entities don't carry such baggage.

Consequently, most true breakthroughs, even today, are by small entities. As an officer of the courts, and someone who truly believes in the American dream, I can only hope that small entities get this message: We need our small inventors. ■

Online ad revolution

NEW SOFTWARE HELPS ADVERTISERS UNDERSTAND WHERE USERS ARE CLICKING

By Angela Hey

Mountain View is at the heart of a worldwide revolution in advertising. In the first half of this year, Google brought in $4.7 billion in advertising revenues, and over 40 percent came from non-Google Web sites. This compares with $101 billion spent on advertising by the top U.S. advertisers in 2005, according to Advertising Age annual profiles.

Angela Hey

Even the smallest merchants can make money by displaying Google ads, using Google's AdSense program. Vendors pay for ads by bidding on key search words.

Or if you don't pay for advertising, you can still see who is reading your Web site using Google Analytics (www.google.com/analytics). This application will tell you the top five pages on your Web site, the top five referring sites, and graph other parameters.

Search engine marketing (SEM) agencies are augmenting and replacing traditional ad agencies. Security companies help detect fraudulent clicks and fake advertisers. Analytics software helps advertisers understand where users are clicking. A couple of Mountain View companies are jumping on the SEM bandwagon.

Efficient Frontier ([tier.com\) applies Wall Street financial algorithms to portfolios of search terms. The so-called efficient frontier, first defined in 1952, gives a reasonable return on an investment portfolio without it being too risky. Now the company Efficient Frontier helps large consumer marketing companies, which use thousands of search terms in their online ads, find out which words produce the best return on investment.](http://www.efron- <div data-bbox=)

For smaller companies, Efficient Frontier Express offers a Web-based solution to manage online ad campaigns. The price an advertiser pays for search terms is constantly changing, so Efficient Frontier's software helps companies bid for terms automatically at reasonable prices. It counts 70 of the top 500 search engine advertisers as its customers and is venture-funded by Redpoint Ventures and Cambrian Ventures.

Another local outfit, Become.com, is a search engine company that filters searches to avoid finding irrelevant links. It focuses on shoppers, although it also offers filtered searches for news items. Some shoppers like to wander the mall, researching the best product; others know what they want, heading directly into a store to shop. Become.com caters to both kinds of online purchaser, the researcher and the shopper. For the researcher, it provides product reviews, discussion forums, buying guides and product details. For the shopper, it can group the results by price, brand, store or category.

It works best for popular items. I tested it on "brake cable" for my bicycle and it found the lowest priced one (66 cents) very quickly.

When I tried "handlebar extender," I found handlebar extenders for baby strollers and motorbikes, but further searching was required to find my bike part. A search on "jeans" gave me plenty of useful alternative search terms like "blue jeans," "denim jeans" or "tight jeans," and then brought up pictures and prices.

Community advertising

As everybody knows by now, Google's great success has enabled it to offer free wireless Internet access to Mountain View citizens and visitors. I had no problem getting basic connectivity on my PDA outside at the Shoreline Lake as well as downtown.

A cool feature, for which one needs a larger laptop screen, is that local community groups can use the site to make free announcements.

Google has already attracted significant competition. Microsoft's adCenter has a smaller, but more business-centric, audience. Yahoo!, with Yahoo! Search Marketing (SM), is courting small businesses. Traditional advertisers won't be left out. Watch as newspapers and yellow pages add new styles of sponsored ads to their online sites. ■ install a WiFi modem on Ling's computer. Ling's second-story apartment, surrounded by a dense row of trees blowing in the wind, proved to be a challenge for connecting to the network, as the nearest node was about 400 feet away. An added challenge was radio interference from seven other personal wireless networks in surrounding apartments.

The modem had to be moved around to different window locations, even to the top of a kitchen cabinet. ExpressNets has sold more than 60 similar modems and Wandling says that all of those that were installed by ExpressNets have worked. But for people who live in "dark spots" away from a node, or are surrounded by trees, Wandling suggests taking Google up on its offer to install more nodes on private buildings to complete city coverage.

"They are committed to lighting up the city completely," Wandling said.

ExpressNets sells two different WiFi modems, the Ruckus Metroflex for $129 and the Peplink Surf for $159. Installation costs $49. At Ling's house, Wandling was installing the Ruckus modem.

"Our vision is to really have it work for people," Wandling said about Google WiFi. "Not just as a convenience, but to encourage new ideas and make a community environment possible."

Google's free WiFi network has come at a crucial time for many Mountain View residents. For example, it's become important for seniors to be able to connect to the Internet, since many senior services, such as Social Security and Medicare, have gone online with information and forms. There are even special e-mail and browsing programs specially designed for seniors.

And it's useful in other ways. Jennifer Burkett, Ling's case worker at the Community Services Agency, brings her laptop on visits to his apartment and said Google WiFi is saving her time and, as a result, taxpayers' money.

"I can't imagine anything that would change someone's life more than this," Burkett said. "When our system goes down I feel like my left arm has been chopped off." ■

Not only were we thrilled with her enthusiasm, professionalism and true concern with our needs. She is truly a great realtor."
