Google ventures into complex world OF HEALTH CARE RECORDS

BY KATHY SCHRENK

Main Photo: Medical Assistant April Martinez helps a patient in the Family Medicine department of the Camino Medical Group center in Mountain View. All exam rooms there have secure computer systems into which physicians can enter any health information, which then becomes part of a patient's private health record. Above:

A screen shot of Google's new feature, Google Health, shows how patients can add conditions or symptoms to their online profile.

Google Inc's latest offering for consumers is a medical records storage service, allowing users to store and sort information about test results, appointments and medications online.

"Google Health" lets users create a health profile and enter all kinds of information: height and weight, test results, allergies, conditions, past surgeries, medications and immunizations.

The service isn't the first of its kind, however. The Palo Alto Medical Foundation, which now includes the Camino Medical group in Mountain View, has been offering online records to patients for about seven years, according to Dr. Paul Tang, chief medical information officer and director of "PAMF Online."

PAMF Online helps users keep track of appointments, test results and prescriptions. It makes all such information available online and sends e-mails to alert patients when a result or prescription is ready or an appointment is coming up.

About 110,000 people — half of PAMF's primary care patients — use the service, Dr. Tang said. "It's more or less the way we do business," he said.

Tang's expertise in this field may be why he is a member of the Google Health Advisory Council (which also includes famous health guru Dr. Dean Ornish) and helped shape the Internet giant's new service.

So far about 20 pharmacies, hospitals and health care Web sites have partnered with Google Health, and customers of those sites can give permission for their information to be transferred to Google. Google hopes more health care groups and pharmacies will partner with the company and share their patients' information — with the patient's permission, of course.

The idea requires a measure of trust from the user, Tang said, in part because Google Health isn't obliged to abide by the federal health privacy law known as HIPAA. The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act only applies to "covered entities" like hospitals; "payers," such as insurance companies; or "clearinghouses," which help share information between small doctor's offices and health insurance companies, Tang said. A service like PAMF Online is covered by HIPAA.

But Tang believes that Google can be trusted. "A company like Google is very sensitive to privacy," he said. "They're also a very trusted company, so you'd expect that they'd take great care and that they'd be very protective of that data."

Google uses security software, hardware and "strict policies" to keep information on Google

Health safe, according to a spokesperson.

The information is protected by state-of-the-art technologies, including Secure Socket Layer (SSL) encryption and firewalls, she said. Hardware backup systems and physical security, including pass codes, locks, and security personnel, are also used.

"Only the people who are operating and improving Google Health have access to user information, and they are bound by strict policies to not disclose this information to others, either within Google or to the outside world," the spokesperson said.

It may be that, as the company enters this new realm, issues of file sharing between different health care databases will be dealt with. PAMF Online is not without its problems on this front: Complications can arise when patients are seeing one PAMF doctor and another doctor at, say, Stanford Medical Center. That's because, even though PAMF, Stanford and even Kaiser Permanente use the same medical records software, they can't share that information across their networks, Tang said.

Federal Secretary of Health and Human Services Mike Leavitt has made improving this "interoperability standard" a primary goal. He believes more information would mean better care for patients and prevent mix-ups like bad prescription interactions, according to the Health and Human Services Web site. ■

Shedding light on autism

By Dr. Ross DeHovitz

Autism is a medical condition frequently in the news today. The media attention that this neurological disability is receiving is fueled by questions and speculation that a preservative used in common childhood vaccines may cause autism, a theory supported by celebrity parents including Jenny McCartney.

According to the National Association of Neurological Disorders and Stroke, experts say three to six children in every 1,000 will have autism.

Q: What is autism?

A: Autism is a complex developmental disability that typically appears during the first three years of life and affects a person's ability to communicate and interact with others. Autism is defined by a certain set of behaviors. It is the most common condition in a group of developmental disorders called autism spectrum disorders that affect individuals differently and to varying degrees. There is no known single cause for autism.

Q: What are the characteristics of autism?

A: The characteristics vary from person to person, and some cases of autism are more severe than others. Some people with mild autism may exhibit only slight delays in language and may have difficulty in social situations, such as initiating and/or maintaining a conversation, while others may exhibit aggressive or self-destructive behavior. Another telltale sign is repetitive behaviors or narrow, obsessive interests.

Other documented traits of autism include resistance to change; difficulty in expressing needs; using gestures or pointing instead of words; laughing and/or crying for no apparent reason; showing distress for reasons not apparent to others; little or no eye contact; sustained odd play; apparent oversensitivity or under-sensitivity to pain; and uneven gross/fine motor skills, among others.

Q: I've heard that a mercury-containing preservative used in vaccines causes autism. Is this true? Is it safe to have my child vaccinated?

A: Many studies have examined the possible link between childhood vaccinations and autism, but to date, none have found that the two are associated. One possible reason for this theory, however, is that autism symptoms tend to become apparent around the same time that children are scheduled to get routine vaccines.

In 1999, the U.S. Public Health Service and the American Academy of Pediatrics supported a directive from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to remove mercury from all vaccines. Since 2001, no regular childhood vaccines have contained mercury-based preservatives, but autism has continued to increase despite this precaution. If mercury were part of the cause of autism, we should have seen a drop in the incidence once it was removed.

While everything we do in medicine has risks, study after study confirms the safety, and personal and public health value, of vaccines. Vaccines protect children against a wide range of diseases, many of which are life threatening. It is very important to vaccinate your child to avoid serious, preventable disease.

Q: Is there a test for autism? How is someone diagnosed with autism?

A: There are no medical tests for diagnosing autism. An accurate diagnosis must be based on observation of the individual's communication, behavior and developmental levels. However, because many of the behaviors associated with autism are shared by other disorders, various medical tests may be ordered to rule out or identify other possible causes of the symptoms.

Q: Is there a cure for autism?

A: There is no cure for autism, but early intervention (from birth to age 3) can have a significant impact on reducing the symptoms of autism spectrum disorders, as the youngest brains are the most adaptable. Treatments include education and behavioral interventions, medications and alternative therapies.

Group holds forum on health care at City Hall

By Casey Weiss

Local health care experts and advocates are holding a panel discussion in Mountain View this week to educate residents on the state's health care system, which they say needs changing.

For several years now, a group called Health Care For All has been lobbying state leaders in Sacramento to pass its bill for a single payer system. Under this system everyone would be insured, and instead of paying premiums to insurance companies, employees and employers would pay one smaller fee to a government agency.

Lynn Huidekoper, a registered nurse and director of the Santa Clara chapter of Health Care for All, compared the single payer system to the current Medicare system.

"No other industrialized country has health care companies making money off the backs of sick people," she said. To fix the problem, her group proposes "making Medicare for all."

Both houses in Sacramento passed the bill in 2006, but Gov. Schwarzenegger did not sign it. The bill is currently back in the state Assembly, according to Huidekoper, who said there are thousands of people dying each year due to lack of proper health care.

"We just keep reintroducing [the bill]," Huidekoper said, "until we get a governor who will sign it."

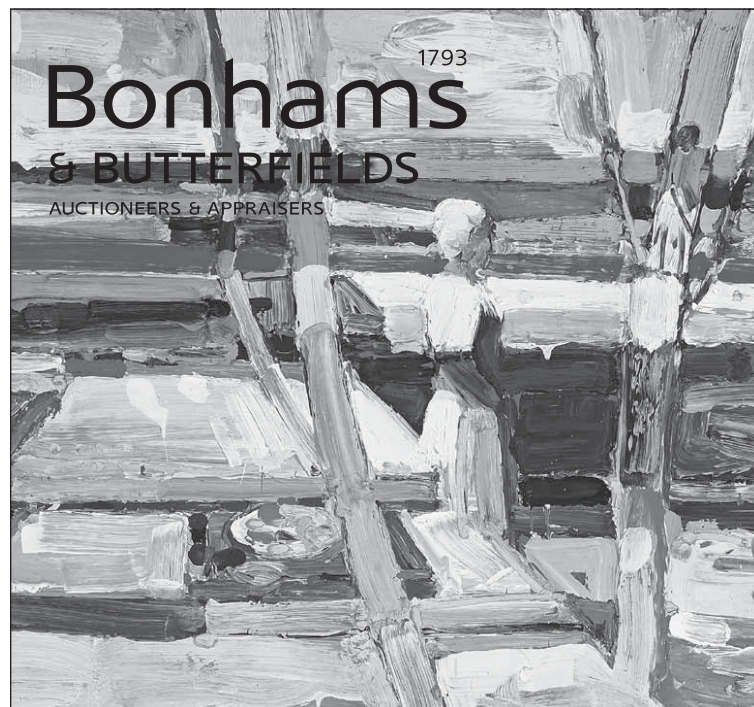

In the meantime, members of the group are holding meetings to discuss the bill with the public. This week's panel discussion is Thursday evening, and kicks off with a documentary on the group's health care proposals.

Health care specialists will then discuss local treatment options for the uninsured.

The event is sponsored by the Peninsula Democratic Coalition, the Santa Clara County chapter of Health Care for All, and the Santa Clara County Single Payer Coalition. ■

■ INFORMATION

The upcoming panel discussion is Thursday, July 10 at 7 p.m. at City Hall, located at 500 Castro St. The event is free and open to the public. For more information, contact Lynn Huidekoper at lynn_huidekoper@hotmail.com.
