EPA SEEKS COMMENTS ON FIVE YEARS OF EFFORTS TO TREAT TCE CONTAMINATION

n Monday evening a watchdog group offered ways to improve the Environmental Protection Agency's efforts to clean up and monitor the toxics left behind by early computer chips makers in northeastern Mountain View.

The EPA has released draft a five-year review of efforts to manage and clean up the portion of the area's 1.5 mile long underground plume of toxic trichloroethylene (TCE) bordered by Middlefield, Ellis and Whisman roads (a collection of Superfund sites known as the MEW), spurring a meeting at City Hall seeking public comments Monday night.

TCE is a carcinogenic cleaning solvent, once heavily used by early chip makers, that was dumped and/or leaked into the groundwater in large quantities. Over 100,000 pounds of

Candidates see housing crisis solutions in North Bayshore

MOST CITY COUNCIL CANDIDATES SAY NEW NEIGHBORHOOD IS NEEDED

By Daniel DeBolt

f their support for a new residential neighborhood north of Highway 101 is any indication, Mountain View's City Council candidates appear to represent a shift in public opinion toward allowing more housing development in Mountain View, balancing the explosive job growth at LinkedIn, Google and other Mountain View tech companies.

The filing period for council candidates ended last week, and there is now a field of nine candidates running for three open seats in the November election: environmental oversight executive Lenny Siegel, civil engineer Pat Showalter, family financial planner Ken Rosenberg, tech executive Lisa Matichak, planning commissioner Margaret Capriles, government policy aide Ellen Kamei, systems administrator Jim Neal, family practice attorney Mercedes Salem and retired electrical engineer and lieutenant colonel Greg Unangst.

Helen Wolter, who had declared her intention to run, pulled out of the race.

In December the City Council is set to approve a precise plan, a blueprint for allowable development in North Bayshore affecting Google, LinkedIn and others. It would allow 3.4 million-square-feet of new offices, possibly bringing as many as 20,000 new jobs, but no housing to the 500-plus acre North Bayshore area which stretches north from Highway 101 to the city limits.

Given the positions each candidate revealed this week, the odds are that there will be a City Council majority in support of North Bayshore housing in January. Lisa Matichak and Margaret Capriles are the only candidates who clearly oppose new residential zoning in North Bayshore, while Unangst, Neal, Siegel and Showalter expressed the clearest support. Rosenberg, a self-proclaimed housing advocate, said

Water district candidate challenges 'unfair' tax

By Kevin Forestieri

ary Kremen isn't pulling any punches. The founder of Match.com kicked off his race for a seat on the county water district board with a harsh critique of the district's performance, and claims the water district has "stonewalled" local property owners on what he says is an unfair tax.

Kremen is the sole challenger running against incumbent Brian Schmidt for the District 7 seat on the Santa Clara Valley Water District Board of Directors. District 7 includes Mountain View, Palo Alto, Los Altos and Los Gatos.

One of Kremen's top issues is water district taxes. Kremen said property owners in Palo Alto, Mountain View and Los Altos Hills pay millions in California State Water Project taxes every year, but don't see the same payoff as the rest of the county because they don't receive state water.

Unlike most of of Santa Clara County, Palo Alto, Mountain View and Los Altos receive a majority of their water from the Hetch Hetchy water system, operated by the San Francisco Public Utilities Commission. Only 10 percent of Mountain View's water comes from state water sources, and Palo Alto receives none at all.

As a result, property owners in these cities subsidize other areas of the district without getting "material benefits," according to Kremen's campaign website. Though Santa Clara Valley district officials argue that the north county area receives other, smaller benefits from the tax, Kremen argues that the only benefit worth mentioning is access to state water.

Kremen is passionate about the inequitable tax, and said it's crazy that anyone would defend

"It boils my blood that people could support this tax," Kremen

Crunching his own numbers, Kremen estimates that Mountain View foots the bill for an annual $1.2 million every year in state water project taxes. The Santa Clara Valley Water District could not confirm the tax dollar amounts by the Voice's press deadline Wednesday.

If elected, Kremen said he would fight to get more water conservation funds for areas that receive little to no state water to compensate for the inequity. He said he would look for ways to get

STABBING AT PARK

A Sunnyvale man was reportedly stabbed at Whisman Park on Wednesday, Aug. 6 during a fight. Police could not determine any suspects in the case.

At 8:21 p.m., the 22-year-old victim suffered a single stab wound to the ribs during a fight at the park. The stab wound was found to be non-life threatening, according to Sgt. Saul Jaeger of the Mountain View Police Department.

Jaeger said the man was at a local hospital being treated for his wound when a nurse contacted police, notifying them that the man appeared to have a stab wound.

The victim and one other witness could not provide consistent statements about what happened, and police could not establish any information about a suspect. The case has been forwarded to detectives for a follow-up.

DOWNTOWN PROVES A BETTER FIT FOR VINTAGE SHOP

By Melissa Landeros

Tiffany Gush, owner of Empire Vintage Clothing in Mountain View, sat quietly on her new shop's floor wearing a bright shawl in hues of green, orange and yellow over a faded black dress. She wrote her current sales of the day on a white board leaning against an enclosed case filled with unique sunglasses.

Owning a vintage store was her lifelong dream, Gush said. Her merchandise is a curated collection of items that reflect her personal style. She hand-picks pieces that fall under her criteria of being "old and unusual," in hopes that her customers will also like them.

For four years, Empire Vintage Clothing was up and running in Palo Alto on Waverley Street. According to Gush, downtown Palo Alto began to change after a some large companies moved in and several office buildings were constructed. These shifts resulted in a significant increase in rent that prompted Gush to relocate.

"I was paying my own personal salary to my landlord," she said. "My rent went up 35

Two LASD board members call it quits

SCHOOL BOARD TRUSTEES TO ANNOUNCE RETIRE FOLLOWING DEAL WITH CHARTER SCHOOL

By Kevin Forestieri

'I really wanted to revamp the way we deliver

curriculum.'

wo board members at the Los Altos School District are leaving on a high note this year. Following approval of the five-year agreement with Bullis Charter School and approval of placing a facilities bond measure for the November ballot, Doug Smith and Mark Goines announced they will step down.

Both Smith and Goines started working with board members at Bullis Charter School about a year ago on what would later become the five-year agreement. Smith had been on almost every one of the "negotiating teams," and was one of two board members who stuck around until the early hours of the morning at mediation meetings to make sure the legal team was happy with every last comma in the agreement.

But Smith won't take any special credit for the agreement. He said everyone on the board and the district staff put a significant amount of time and effort into the agreement, and helped to strike a comprehensive compromise between the district and the charter school.

"It's always a team effort," Smith said.

He said that Randy Kenyon in particular, the district's assistant superintendent of business services, did a great job giving the board an idea of what the school district needed to provide to the charter school under Proposition 39.

Though Smith did not say whether his decision to retire from the board hinged on the approval of the five-year agreement or the board's success in getting a bond measure on the November ballot, he did say that the new board members will be in a more stable position going forward.

Though the five-year agreement and the ballot measure are fresh on everyoneis minds,

Smith said he's also proud of how much the district has improved the school programs over the years, which included throwing out the "old model" of teaching.

'When I ran five years ago, I really wanted to revamp the way we deliver curriculum," Smith said.

He said the district has done a great job shifting away from lecture-style teaching and towards collaborative work and small group projects, where students divide up responsibility for the project and have specific jobs.

"If you look at kids leaving the program, they are able to work well with others, and they are inquisitive," Smith said.

When elected to the board, one of the first things Smith had to do was hire a new superintendent for the district. He said the board's choice of

Jeff Baier has worked out great, and that the board has had a "fantastic" relationship with

We chose someone that we collaborate with well," Smith said. "Jeff is always very wellprepared."

In a statement addressed to the LASD community, Goines commended Baier and district staff for their service during his time on the board and for "their dedication and excellent service to children."

With Smith and Goines opting out of this year's school board election, five people will be vying for the three open seats. The decision by the two incumbents not to run gave the green light to Vladimir Ivanovic, a Gardner Bullis parent, who said his decision to run for a board seat hinged on whether Smith and Goines planned to run for re-election. He said the board has done a good job so far, and that there was no rea-

P.E. issue pulls in candidates

PARENTS WHO FOUGHT FOR FLEXIBLE SCHEDULES RUNNING FOR HIGH SCHOOL BOARD

By Kevin Forestieri

The outpouring of parent support last May for a ninth-grade P.E. exemption may have a lingering effect going into the November election. Two of those supporters, one of whom was "disappointed" by the board's decision on the issue, are running for seats on the Mountain View-Los Altos Union High School District board.

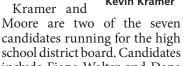

Kevin Kramer and Doug Moore, both parents of incoming freshmen, came to the May 12 board meeting to make their case to allow ninth-graders an exemption from physical education class.

The idea was that freshmen with ambitious schedules that include after-school sports, an instrument and a foreign language should be allowed an exemption from physical education classes during sports seasons. A student who participates in two to three sports would spend minimal time taking P.E. throughout the year.

Board members had reviewed the state education code before the meeting to determine whether ninth-graders could be legally exempt from P.E., and ultimately decided to look at ways they could make the exemption work — but not in time for this school year.

Kramer, along with his wife and son, spoke at the board meeting to make a case for the exemption.

He said the board's final decision was disappointing, and led him to consider running for a spot on the board.

school district board. Candidates include Fiona Walter and Dana Bunnett, along with incumbents Debbie Torok and Joe Mitchner. Moore has not yet responded to the Voice's requests for an interview, and the other candidates were featured in previous stories in the Voice.

Kevin T. Kramer

Kramer is a Yahoo employee with two sons, one an incoming freshman and the other a seventh-grader at Graham. He said his interest in the district stems from his kids' high school future, and how the ninthgrade exemption from P.E. was handled.

The (decision) led me to want to try and change things, that policy included," he said. "I want my second son to have that opportunity."

Kramer said he would work for more flexible schedules to help kids get the most out of high school, give them the experience they need going into college, and maximize opportunities. Kramer said he wants to accommodate students with packed school schedules without forcing them to take an early morning zero period.

As for what courses are offered by the district, Kramer said he went through the course catalog with his son, and the school district has done a good job offering a diverse set of classes. He said the district could look at ways of expanding online classes, and coordinate with colleges to offer more advanced courses.

Kramer said he has teaching experience as an adjunct professor at a law school for four years, and has a strong legal background managing a team of 20 people and a "huge" fiscal budget. He said the school district is in a good spot financially, and that the facilities aren't in a state of disrepair — and he wants to keep it that way.

"I think the school district is in pretty good shape, and I aim to maintain and improve that,' Kramer said. **▼

BERNADETTE MARY BENNETT

Bernadette "Berna" Mary Bennett, a Mountain View resident who ran a swim school, died July 28 at the age of 87. A memorial Mass will be held at 11 a.m. on Friday, Aug. 22 at St. Nicholas Church, 473 Lincoln Ave., Los Altos.

The fifth of eight children, she was born in Cleveland to Adam and Mildred Masarik, both born in Slovakia. After growing up in an immigrant neighborhood, she moved west, settling in Los Angeles at age 18.

She began working as a stylist at the Bullocks Wilshire beauty salon. After being discovered at a local pool, she joined the prestigious swim team of the Los Angeles Athletic Club, where she won many medals and trophies, her family said. She was the 13th fastest in 100-meter freestyle nationally, and tried out for the 1952 U.S. Olympic Team.

At age 26, she married Joe

Bennett. After having two sons, the family relocated to Mountain View, and had four girls. She lived in Mountain View and Los Altos for the rest of her life.

As her children grew, she began swimming in masters competitions, and continued as a masters swimmer into her 80s. At age 47, she set the national record in 50-yard freestyle, her family said. At 69, she swam 50-meter freestyle in 41.40 seconds.

In 1970, she opened her own swim school in her back yard pool, and her many clients returned year after year. According to her family, she taught over 2,200 children to swim. She wrote a book on teaching children to swim which sold out its first printing and is now an e-book.

After her marriage ended when she was 50, she continued with her swim school and competitive swimming, and ventured into modeling and acting. She learned magic and performed as a clown at childrenis parties. She traveled with her siblings and children to Kenya, Europe, Hawaii and Bali. A devout Catholic, she also made pilgrimages to Lourdes, Nevers and Israel. Family members said they will remember her especially for her adventurous independence, youthful spirit, empathy and kindness.

She had also served as a hospice volunteer with Pathways, making visits to Villa Siena in Mountain View, where she eventually made her last home.

Mosquito fogging set for Tuesday

By Cooper Aspegren

The Santa Clara County Vector Control has scheduled mosquito fogging in parts of Mountain View and Sunnyvale on Tuesday, Aug. 19, from 11 p.m. to 2 a.m. in an effort to prevent West Nile virus infections in people.

The effort comes after mosquitoes infected with the virus were collected from the zip codes 94086, 94087, 94040 and 94041. The fogging area lies between Highway 237 and Central Expressway to the north; W. Remington Drive to the south; Mathilda Avenue, S. Taaffe Street and Spinosa Drive to the east; and Highway 85 to the west.

Noor Tietze, Vector Control's scientific and technical services manager, said that there were reports of dead birds within the area — testing found that the birds were infected with West Nile Virus.

Vector Control set up mosquito traps around the area and confirmed that there were mosquitoes infected with the virus, according to Tietze.

According to Tietze, the fogging treatment will take place at night because mosquitoes are most active at that time. At night, traffic is lighter, fewer people are out and bees are more likely to be in hives, Tietze said.

Tietze said that the county vector control uses five pick-up trucks for the fogging treatment. According to Tietze, four trucks use an electric motor and one truck uses a gas powered spray machine to deliver the treatment.

According to Tietze, the fogging treatment consists of the pesticide Zenivez and is not toxic to people.

Tietze said that most people infected with West Nile virus nationwide do not report symptoms. However, some people infected with the virus do experience fevers and some may suffer serious illness or death.

Tietze said that he predicts some people in Santa Clara County will be infected with West Nile before October, when the season generally ends, according to Tietze.

According to the California Department of Public Health's website, 560 birds have been reported killed by West Nile virus this year. Tietze said that 24 birds from Mountain View been confirmed dead from the virus as of Tuesday, Aug. 12 and that crows constitute a majority of the dead birds.

Tietze said the fogging treatment will be postponed if the wind and weather conditions are not optimal.

To contact the Santa Clara County Vector Control regarding mosquitoes, call 408-918-4770 or go to www.sccgov.org/sites/vector. For more information about the fogging, call 800-314-2427

VTA pulls plug on Evelyn station

Several riders told the Voice that they find the station convenient, but the VTA reports that the station along Evelyn Avenue near Pioneer Way is the second least-used in the entire light rail system.

It will be demolished to make way for a second track across Central Expressway and into downtown Mountain View, eliminating a bottleneck for the 902 line, allowing better service as ridership increases, according to VTA officials.

The "Mountain View Double Track" project is estimated to cost $63 million, and work may begin this summer to add track between the downtown station and Highway 85. The Evelyn station closure is likely to happen

GRANT APPLICATIONS OPEN

The Los Altos Community Foundation has now opened its first application cycle for community grants this fiscal year. The deadline to apply for a grant is Tuesday, Sept. 23.

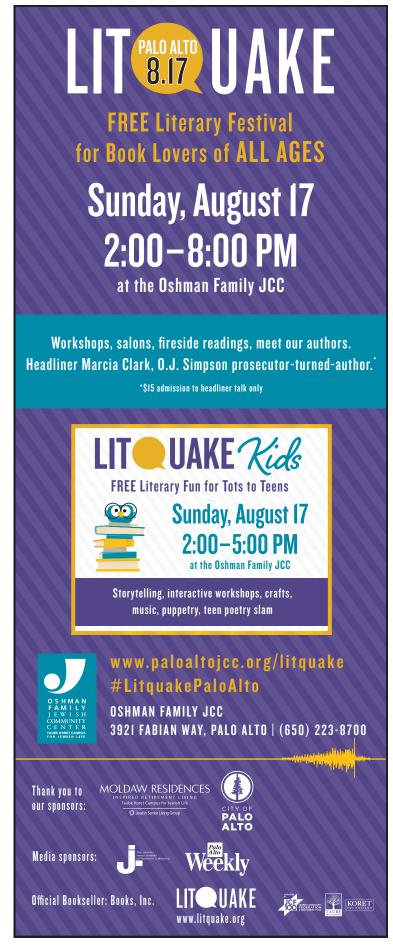

The foundation's community grants support non-profit organizations in Los Altos, Los Altos Hills and the surrounding area. The grants serve such purposes as aiding local philanthropy, encouraging volunteerism and improving the community's quality of life, according to a statement from the foundation.

Grants are available to both new and established organizations. Among the causes the foundation has provided grants to is nonprofit organic farm Hidden Villa's "Healthy Food, Healthy Families" initiative which supplies 25 percent of Hidden Villa's produce to Mountain View's Community Services Agency for low-income families, according to Hidden Villa deputy director of development Marc Sidel.

The foundation has given more than $1.3 million in grants since 1991. More information about the Los Altos Community Foundation is at losaltoscf.org or by calling 650-949-5908.

Water district candidate outspends incumbent

By Kevin Forestieri

The first campaign finance report of the year was due last week, and there's a sharp divide between the two candidate running to represent Mountain View on the Santa Clara Valley Water District in the November election.

As of June 30, Gary Kremen spent over $41,000 on his run for the District 7 seat, according to campaign documents filed with Santa Clara County.

Kremen is running against incumbent Brian Schmidt, and, during the period from Jan. 1 to June 30, vastly outspent Schmidt.

Schmidt had no cash contributions and reports spending no money during the same period.

Kremen is his own biggest supporter thus far, having loaned his campaign $63,500. He reported receiving over $6,200 in cash contributions.

Big contributions include $1,000 from Ralph Eschenbach, vice president of venture capital firm Sand Hill Angels, and $1,000 from Beverly Anderson, an Oklahoma-based CEO for a company that sells high-end equestrian clothes.

Kremen also received $1,000 from Julie Kremen, who runs "photography tours" in San Diego, and $1,000 from Scott Macomber, principal of Vinedo Group LLC. Almost all of his contributions come from people listed as residents in the Bay Area.

A lion's share of his spending so far has been on polling and survey research. Kremen paid $25,000 to EMC Research, a company that conducts political polling, public opinion studies and public policy research. Other expenditures include $8,700 to law firm Rutan and Tucker LLP, $2,500 to McGovern and Associates and Consulting, Inc. and a total of over $2,900 to campaign consultant Jeffrey Cianci.

Kremen's war chest is in sharp contrast to incumbent Brian Schmidt's, according to the reports. In the same period, Schmidt reported receiving $266 in non-monetary campaign contributions from Carolyn Eriksson, a retired woman in San Mateo who donated 18 campaign t-shirts.

The next filing reports are due Oct. 6. ■ cash rebates for property owners who use Hetch Hetchy water, or remove the state water tax from those areas entirely.

Kremen said he would also vote to return the already-paid tax money to property owners that use Hetch Hetchy water.

These solutions seem unrealistic to Schmidt, who said Kremen would be hard-pressed to get the other six board members to vote for a tax exemption or increased funding that would specifically benefit his district.

"You could argue that Palo Alto and Mountain View should receive more water conservation funds, but good luck passing that," Schmidt said.

Schmidt said he agrees that the northernmost region of the county doesn't reap the same benefits from the state water tax, but the money isn't flexible — it has to be spent on state water projects.

He suggested that the district could compensate the region by using other funds to improve recycled water infrastructure in areas that rely on Hetch Hetchy water. Those improvements could look like an expansion of pipelines for recycled water around Stanford and other areas. Expansion of recycled water infrastructure, Schmidt said, would be a far more palatable option for other board members.

Trouble with Mountain View flood projects

Kremen criticized the water district for poor management of flood projects, specifically citing its attempt to build a flood basin at Cuesta Park Annex. The flood basin was part of the Permanente Creek Flood Protection Project — a heavily revised project that took years to get approved by Mountain View City Council.

Mountain View City Council.

The project originally included constructing four flood detention basins to protect 2,720 Mountain View properties in the event of a 100-year-flood — including one at the Cuesta Park Annex. The plan received sharp criticism from the public before the district staff updated the hydrology for the project and realized they didn't need a flood basin at Cuesta Park Annex in the first place.

The changes to the project frustrated public officials like Santa Clara County Supervisor Joe Simitian, who told the district last year he was skeptical of the flood project and felt they had lost credibility when they made drastic changes partway through the planning and design phases.

The sentiment was similar at last year's May 14 Mountain View City Council meeting, when council member Ronit Bryant said "the process has been long, and tortured, and really unsatisfactory in lots and lots of ways."

At the same meeting, council member Margaret Abe-Koga said, "I felt like I stuck my neck out. And then to have the project changed and say, 'Well we didn't really need Cuesta Annex,' that has really been a frustration and a disappointment."

Kremen said the proposed Cuesta Park Annex flood basin was a "debacle" for the district and that the district failed to listen to the local community. He said it's also been a wasteful project, and that the district has spent $20 million prior to construction because of all the delays and redesigns.

Kremen's list of endorsements include Abe-Koga as well as Mountain View city council member Michael Kasperzak, according to his campaign website.

Potential conflict of interest

On his campaign website, Kremen accuses Schmidt of having an undisclosed, potentially major conflict of interest because of the job he held when he ran for the water district board.

Schmidt was an employee with the Committee for Green Foothills, a Bay Area non-profit environmental organization that could benefit from additional water district funds. Schmidt's conflict of interest had been supposedly discovered by local news outlets before he "unexpectedly" quit his job, according to the website.

But Schmidt denied the allegations, and said that he had disclosed his potential conflict of interest before taking office during his campaign in 2010.

"I acknowledged that potential conflict of interest from day one," Schmidt said.

Schmidt said controversy over his job at Committee for Green Foothills surfaced in 2011 when the board considered redirecting funds into flood projects, and someone suggested some of that money go to the committee. Schmidt mentioned he may have a conflict of interest deciding where that money goes, and district lawyers explored it in an attorney-client memo.

Schmidt said the information in the attorney-client memo is confidential and that he can't release it to the public, but that didn't stop one local newspaper from asking him for it. Schmidt said a story in the Mercury News in 2011 indicated that he tried to keep the details of his possible conflict of interest a secret.

"I couldn't release the memo," Schmidt said. "That would be blatantly unethical and I'd risk being censured."

Kremen said nobody can say for sure whether Schmidt had a conflict of interest until that memo is released.

"It's really hard to say what his conflict of interest is because it's a secret," Kremen said. "And how many times has he called on the board to release it?"

"I still feel like I went above and beyond when I quit," Schmidt said.

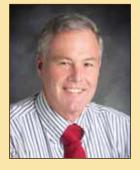

Schmidt said Kremen himself might be looking at a possible conflict of interest if elected to the water district board. Kremen is currently the board chair for WaterSmart Software, a tech company that creates water meter software.

Kremen said WaterSmart does not have any relationship with the water district, nor are there any plans for the company to do business with the district. He said even if WaterSmart decides later to work with the district, he would never take a role at the company where he would receive money, be employed or act as a consultant.

Whisman School District.

Coladonato is the founder and president of the Slater Neighborhood Association, and made a big splash at a board meeting last April when he rallied support for a school in the Whisman and Slater neighborhoods. He said he was happy with the results of that meeting, and said he wants to make sure the school continues to address the need for a school in the northeastern portion of Mountain View.

"The current board looks like they want to move forward," Coladonato said. "We should see an update in the next few months."

He said it benefits the community to have a school in the area, and that every neighborhood should have a school they can get to by foot.

"I think communities are stronger and healthier when they're close enough to walk to their school site," Coladonato said.

Coladonato has a background in business and finances, as well as a degree in physics and computer science. He said his background helps him understand complicated budgets, which board members need to make a judgment on, and helped him as chair of the Measure G Bond Oversight Committee.

In regards to Measure G spending, Coladonato said he supports more fiscal restraint on big projects to avoid going over-budget, and more discussion on the district-wide scope of the the bond. He said right now Measure

G funds are being evenly distributed at each school campus, rather than prioritizing specific projects the district needs most.

As a board member, he would support moving away from the idea that schools should get a similar pot of money, and move towards the overall goal of improving facilities on a district level "It may seem like a fair and equitable way to spend the money, but that's secondary to the ultimate goal," Coladonato said.

Part of Coladonato's plan to "upgrade" education includes closing the achievement gap, finding news ways to teach and drawing inspiration from schools outside the district. He said there are examples of charter schools that have excellent student outcomes with student demographics people wouldn't expect.

Coladonato said he would also raise the standards for new teachers, and try to attract the very best high school and college graduates into the teaching profession. He said the current teachers are great, but going forward he would be open to discuss how the district could better appeal to those high-performing graduates.

"I don't think there any realistic way to have excellent schools without being filled with talented teachers," Coladonato said.

Coladonato said one way to make that happen is through an increase in pay. Coladonato said the starting salaries for teachers are too low for these "top students" who often have other job options with higher pay, and that he would support higher teacher salaries.

It was a "heartbreaking" to give up her Palo Alto location, but she wasn't willing to give up on her business, she said.

"Being an entrepreneur is in my blood," she said. "I just want to be successful and have fun doing it."

As of February, Empire Vintage relocated to downtown Mountain View at 831 Villa Street. Gush describes her move as ultimately beneficial, because now she is surrounded by independent, small and local businesses. It is an area immersed with young people, which is a better match for her and her customers, she said.

"It's an up-and-coming hipster central," Gush said. "Mountain View is really changing, Villa Street is really popular."

Discovering the new location was a moment of serendipity. One morning Gush decided to drive down Villa Street and saw a "for rent sign," that had been put up the night before.

"That building is the biggest eyesore on the block, but I think she is a diamond in the rough," Gush said.

After negotiating with her new landlord, Empire Vintage Clothing was back in business with the help of Gush's two sales associates. Gush's background in interior design helped with the revitalization of the 85-year-old space, which took about a month, she said.

TCE has been removed from the ground in the MEW, once home to plants run by Intel, Fairchild, Raytheon and others.

According to the EPA, "the purpose of the five-year review is to evaluate the performance of the cleanup actions and to determine whether the groundwater and vapor intrusion remedy is protective of human health and the environment.'

Of particular concern is the potential for vapor intrusion into buildings, as pregnant women are at risk of having babies with birth defects after only a few weeks' exposure to TCE vapors, and people are at risk of cancer and other health problems from years of exposure, the EPA says.

At the meeting Monday, Peter Strauss and Lenny Siegel of the Center for Public Environmental Oversight said notices should be placed on buildings above the plume to let people know if they could potentially be exposed, as a group of Google employees were for a few weeks in late 2012, when the ventilation systems at 369 and 379 Whisman Road stopped working properly.

'We have been recommending for a long time there be notices at entrances" to buildings, Strauss said, adding that the notice should include a way for people to access more detailed information. "It shouldn't be frightening to people, just put it in a way that people are made aware.'

The EPA has tested for vapors in all of the commercial buildings over the MEW area and reports that all of them have clean indoor air. People working in those buildings, including several Google office buildings, rely on special ventilation systems to keep TCE vapors out.

Siegel and Strauss asked the EPA to begin requiring new technology to "move towards continuous monitoring" of indoor TCE vapor levels in buildings over the plume. The current practice is to take air samples over a 24-hour period, a few times a year.

Traditional indoor air sampling "may not catch peaks that may present a risk," Siegel said, pointing to a study done in Utah that showed wide swings in TCE vapor concentrations inside a building. He added that the EPA's monitoring plan "doesn't account for the temporal variability in vapor intrusion, although their new directive says it should account for variability."

"Companies and labs are developing small devices that could be employed like smoke detectors," said Siegel, which could tell whether TCE vapors are exceeding safety limits for women. "We want to catch these peaks when there's exposure to a woman who is pregnant and might not know she is pregnant."

The EPA has sampled over 140 homes in the area for TCE vapors, and so far only three had unsafe levels. Two homes had elevated TCE vapors inside nearby on Evandale Avenue atop two "hot spots" — small but ĥighly concentrated deposits of TCE that were unexpectedly found on Evandale Avenue in 2012, just outside the plume boundary Whisman Road. The EPA is investigating what appears to have been the cause: a leaky sewer line that once carried toxics away from the computer chip factories down Evandale Avenue throughout the 1950s and early

The EPA has been hunting for "hot spots" of TCE along sewer lines in the area by sampling air vapors in manhole covers. Över 200 such samples have been taken and so far no new hot spots have been found, said EPA project manager Alana Lee at the Aug. 7 Moffett Field Restoration Advisory Board meeting.

"Manhole vapor sampling only

Avenue where high levels of TCE were once found (and since been cleaned up). No explanation has ever been made for why TCE was found there, says Lenny Siegel, director of Mountain View's Center for Public Environmental Oversight.

"People at the German school wanted me to reassure them they didn't have a hot spot and I couldn't," said Siegel at a meeting for the Moffett Field Restoration Advisory Board on Aug. 8, referring to storm drains and sewer lines that may have once carried small portions of TCE.

"There seems to be some flow out of the slurry walls," Lee said at the RAB meeting. "We're looking for some alternatives to treat that (TCE contamination) rather than rolling along pumping and treating." On Monday EPA officials added that three of the four major MEW slurry walls were leaking, including those along Middlefield Road and Whsiman Road, the plume's boundary with the residential area next door.

"I suspect that it's cracking there's all sort of problems with it," Strauss said of the network of clay and cement slurry walls, which reach 40 to 100 feet deep into the ground to contain the MEW portions of the plume. He suggested replacing some of the walls with a "funneling gate permeable barrier" made of zerovalent iron which passively works to degrade TCE contaminants as it passes through the wall.

Polluters and regulators have been at odds over whether certain areas can be left to "monitored natural attenuation." That means allowing naturally occurring bacteria to break down the TCE and finish the cleanup process. There is also concern about whether enough areas are proposed for new "in-situ" remedies where materials are injected into the ground to help degrade the TCE, as is being done with success to clean up the hot spots on Evandale Avenue.

EPA is seeking comments on the five year review until Aug. 26. It can be found at epa.gov/ region9/mew tells us what is currently occurring, it does not tell us what occurred in the past," Lee said.

Lee revealed that the EPA has also found that groundwater contaminated with TCE is finding its way into the area's sewer lines, which did not appear to be major concern, as it would presumably be treated at the waste water plant in Palo Alto where the lines run. The EPA has often permitted some toxic sites to be cleaned up by pumping contaminated groundwater into sewer lines, Lee said.

The EPA is now being called on to investigate sewer lines and storm drains to the south of the Wagon Wheel neighborhood, such as those lines that run by the Silva well on Sherland toxics from Intel and Raytheon through the area by the German International School of Silicon Valley.

In response, Lee said that one groundwater sample was taken on the north end of the campus of the German International School of Silicon Valley, located on Easy Street, and no TCE was found. The sample was taken in the parking lot of the school. Another concern is leakage of the "slurry walls" that provide deep underground containment of the TCE within the MEW site. Most of the TCE there has been removed by filtering groundwater in through "pump and treat" systems, which continue to operate, making very slow progress in removing the last

North Bayshore housing seems like the right thing but wants to see an environmental study to make an informed decision. Kamei expressed the most concern, saying she would only support housing there with adequate transportation infrastructure and accessible amenities, like a school and grocery store.

"Yes, we want to see housing out there — it is simply the right thing to do," said candidate Showalter in a email, adding that it had to be bird-friendly. There are rare burrowing owls and a colony of egrets living at Shoreline Park and along Stevens Creek) and city officials must consider the flood risks caused by rising sea levels in the nearby bay, she said.

Salem is the only candidate who did not respond to requests for comments about North Bayshore housing, though she says the thrust of her campaign is to help middle class families who are struggling to find affordable housing in the area.

In 2012, council members voted 4-3 against a plan for 1,100 homes in North Bayshore, with outgoing members Margaret-Abe-Koga, Jac Siegel and Ronit Bryant opposed to North Bayshore housing. It may only take one new council member to create a 4-3 majority in support of North Bayshore housing.

The positions of the candidates in this year's election already represent a shift in public opinion about housing needs in the city. Silicon Valley's housing shortage is often blamed on a "not-in my backyard" political culture where residents often oppose housing development in their neighborhoods. Lisa Matichak, who voted against North Bayshore housing as a planning commissioner in 2012, is the only candidate with track record of opposing a housing development. Wolter, who pulled out of the race, was part of the opposition that kept as many as 450 homes from being built at 100 Mayfield Avenue a fight that helped elicit support for Bryant, Siegel and Abe-Koga during the 2006 election. Eight years later, the public discussion on housing issues has changed, with growing concern that a lack of housing is driving up rents and home prices.

Many have said that more local housing development would mean less commuter traffic if people can live near their jobs, but Capriles and Kamei raised the concern that North Bayshore housing development might add to the area's traffic problems. Council members who oppose North Bayshore residential development have also said North Bayshore residents would be making more car trips than commuters in order to take kids to school and shop for groceries, among other things. Candidate Lenny Siegel said he doesn't see it as such a problem.

"Residential construction, even if we assume half the new residents will walk or bike to work in North Bayshore, will still add vehicle trips, " Siegel said in an email. "But there are three differences. A smaller share of trips will be during rush hour. Residents will drive shorter distances (to markets, for example) than commuters, many of whom already drive 90 minutes or more each way. Residents will be driving out of the area when commuters are driving in, taking advantage of unused road capacity."

Candidate Jim Neal had a similar take on the situation, saying in an email, "I would rather see housing in the North Bayshore than additional offices. I believe that allowing more offices there will aggravate an already severe jobs/housing imbalance, as well as increasing the traffic problems. Building housing there would help to at least partially alleviate traffic issues."

Capriles, who sits on the city planning commission, is not jumping on any bandwagon that says housing is the necessary fix to traffic jams.

"Transportation is the main issue for this area and it's important for the community to get clarity on how either commercial or housing will add to this already complex problem," Capriles said.

Capriles said.

Capriles added another concern, that housing will cause "a direct negative impact on the special environment we have in the Shoreline Regional Park. Even though the change area does not include the park area, it will not prevent encroachment into that area. Shoreline Regional Park is a jewel in our city and one that we want to protect."

So far, the city's plan creates buffer zones near wildlife habitat and focuses development away from Shoreline Park and Stevens Creek. Perhaps the strongest environmental concern expressed by opponents is that house cats and dogs could wipe out the small population of ground-dwelling burrowing owls at Shoreline Park, which is declining in numbers but not an endangered species.

Siegel said that, as someone who has been involved in wetland restoration for years, he sees added commuter traffic and tailpipe emissions from restricting housing growth as a bigger environmental problem than any feared impacts to wildlife.

Planning director Randy Tsuda said that the 2012 proposal to add 1,100 homes to North Bayshore — which was supported by Google and the Mountain View Chamber of Commerce — was made with the idea "that we didn't want to design such large area for housing in that we'd have residential projects scattered around North Bayshore." Instead, the approach was "clustering them around Shoreline Boulevard to create more of a neighborhood feel."

Siegel has been advocating for much more North Bayshore residential development, 5,000 homes or more, in order to support a grocery store, a school and other services in North Bayshore. On the other hand, Showalter noted that Costco is just a short trip from North Bayshore via the less trafficked San Antonio Road (also, the Bailey Park Safeway is less than a mile away from North Bayshore via Shoreline Boulevard, which is often gridlocked with commuter traffic.)

Kamei expressed concern that adding housing to North Bayshore plans would delay development there for years, but Tsuda told the Voice that that wasn't necessarily the case. If the council goes with the 2012 plan for 1,100 homes, much of the work has already been done. The first step would be to amend the city's general plan to provide the necessary zoning, which Tsuda said could be done quickly because the council has already certified an Environmental Impact Report that studied housing in North Bayshore.

Next, the council would have to update the North Bayshore precise plan and do a new environmental study. How much time this would take depends on what the council wants, but "a simple amendment would take nine to 12 months, mainly due to California Environmental Quality Act requirements," Tsuda said.

Such changes do not necessarily mean that development would have to stop in North Bayshore, he said. "Potentially, projects could proceed in the development review process while the Precise Plan is being amended," Tsuda said.

If the council asks for more than 1,100 homes? "I couldn't even hazard a guess" as to how long it could take, Tsuda said.

Rosenberg said the council's goal of approving a North Bayshore precise plan without housing in December is "premature," given community interest in housing.

"I would vote for a thorough environmental review on the viability of a large enough housing community to support itself," Rosenberg said in an email. "At that point, I'd then have information and data as to inform my opinion. There is value to having people live close to where they work, indeed, but I need to see that it's a better alternative."

EDITORIAL THE OPINION OF THE VOICE

'Host family' plan is sound public policy, with a heart

"A lot of people are pro life — this is to the Pew Research Center, the number part of community organizations that a pro-life issue." That's how St. Joseph Church parishioner Sylvia Villasenor framed the urgent issue of caring for Central American children who have been caught crossing the U.S.-Mexico border in record number, unaccompanied by an adult and without resources. And she's right.

Responding to the growing humanitarian crisis involving these vulnerable refugees, the Santa Clara County Board of Supervisors earlier this month directed county administrators to lay the groundwork for a "host family" program to provide safe temporary haven for a number of these children, who are now being warehoused near the border, awaiting immigration hearings.

Supervisor Joe Simitian told the Voice that the program, if approved by the supervisors in coming weeks, would help identify and connect some of the children with local host families "who have big enough hearts and big enough homes" to take them in. And the need for big hearts and homes to help alleviate this crisis is tremendous. According of unaccompanied children 12 and under crossing the border from Central America, and being caught in the border patrol net, has risen by 117 percent this fiscal year compared with the same period last year. The U.S. Customs and Border Patrol office estimates that more than 90,000 unaccompanied minors, including teens, will cross the border in 2014, which is nearly three times the agency's estimate of those crossing last vear.

Most of these children are from El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras, and they are fleeing levels of violence unseen in any other area of the world outside of war zones, according to a report on the crisis posted on the progressive think tank Center for Economic and Policy Research website.

The county's host family program is sure to draw intense criticism from U.S. citizens who oppose leniency for undocumented immigrants, but the supervisors' preliminary move toward helping to address a dire need is commendable, as is the willingness on the are offering their help to make the program work.

County officials note that the host family program would be modeled on standard student-exchange programs. Volunteer families would be screened, and children would be placed in appropriate homes. There would be no draining of resources from the county's foster care program, and the county expects reimbursement from the federal government for its host family program. With the federal government spending millions on housing these children now, host families "could probably do the job more cost-effectively, and in a way that's better for the kids involved," Supervisor Simitian said.

County administrators will present a host family plan on Aug. 26 for possible approval by the supervisors, four of five of whom supported creating such a program at an Aug. 5 meeting. We hope they will stay on track and approve this program, which if crafted with care could be a model of compassion and effectiveness in public policy.

VOICES FROM THE COMMUNITY

COUNCIL MEMBERS' PAY INCLUDES MORE THAN MONEY

At the very meeting of the Mountain View City Council (on April 22) when a proposal to increase the base salary of council members came up for discussion, dozens of people spoke about raising the minimum wage in the city. San Jose city voters adopted a city-wide minimum wage last November.

Instead of placing a measure on the ballot concerning the minimum wage or any other matter of widespread concern, the City Council majority voted in June to place on the November ballot only a proposed increase in council salary.

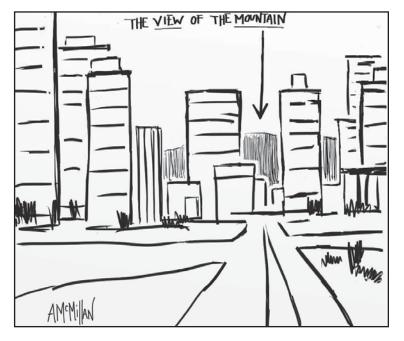

Then, in their July ballot argument in favor of the pay raise, proponents of the measure, led by two city council members, failed to disclose any of the other benefits council members receive.

Beyond their small "salary," council members qualify for (1) all city benefits paid to fulltime employees, (2) expense accounts and reimbursements for authorized travel, (3) VIP tickets to Shoreline Amphitheatre, (4) communications equipment, and (5) stipends for attending regional board meetings.

In addition, council members receive the authority to make critical decisions that affect the whole community (including themselves) and can use their positions to make potential business contacts, and build a political resume and campaign contributors to run for higher office.

With all of those benefits, so much for council members to decide, and no incumbents eligible to run again this year, there is no shortage of candidates for City Council.

HUNAN GARDEN REBORN WITH FUSION TWIST AS MANDARIN ROOTS COMMENTATION ROOTS Review by DALE F. BENTSON // Photos by NATALIA NAZAROVA

et's not argue. Some of you might say Mandarin Roots isn't really a true Chinese restaurant, it's an Asian-Californian-fusion restaurant. It is, but the menu and presentation fall predominantly on the west side of the International Date Line.

The El Camino Real space was Hunan Garden for 15 years until the owner, Simon Yuan, decided to turn the business over to his son, Jarvis. Reopened as of May 31, Jarvis Yuan has remodeled the restaurant, semi-enclosing the patio with a new awning and adding elements that make seating a pleasurable indoor-outdoor affair. Outside, there is a vine-covered brick wall, flowing curtains, flowering plants, comfortable chairs and booths, plus strings of festive party lights overhead.

Inside, there is new paint and carpeting, tables, chairs, and a banquette as well as high-definition TVs in the cozy bar. It's a complete makeover fresh, contemporary and inviting. Equally inviting is the happy hour Monday through Friday, from 5 to 7 p.m. during which eight delicious items as well as beer, wine, and well cocktails are attractively priced at $5 each.

Normally, I don't sing the praises of happy hour but the appetizers were so tasty and the portions so generous, I would be remiss to not point it out. All happy hour items are also on the regular menu. The San Tung chicken wings ($8) — lightly battered, crispy, meaty wings dressed with a garlic-hoisin glaze, scallions and "garlic candy" — were about the tastiest wings I've had. The garlic candy is made from paper-thin slices of garlic, blanched twice and cooked to translucency in a sweet syrup.

Another happy hour selection was a pork belly quesadilla ($8) — scallion flatbread that was wrapped around braised pork belly, mozzarella and gouda cheese, with a flavorful mangokimchee emulsion.

There were also pork potstickers ($9) — fresh and piping hot — as well as salt-and-pepper calamari ($9) that was crisp and light. Bahn mi sliders ($9) featured Painted Hills natural beef, smoked gouda and gruyere, Laotian chili aioli and picked root vegetables, served on tiny steamed buns.

The Yuan family didn't want Jarvis to go into the restaurant business. Growing up, he never worked at Hunan Garden. But it was in his blood, so he attended the California Culinary Academy, then worked in Asian restaurants both locally and in Southern California. Two years ago he moved back home and refined his style under executive chef Kenny So at Santana Row's Sino restaurant.

restaurant chain. The menu, though, was Yuan's vision. "Elevated street food," he calls it.

Regular menu items include eye-pleasing and delicious honeyed walnut prawns ($13). The large prawns were capped with candied walnuts and kumquats under a gentle honey mustard glaze. It had a great flavor curve: crunchy, salty and then sweet.

The corn fritters ($7) vaguely resembled a honeycomb with clotted roasted corn and roasted seaweed, accompanied by sweet chili sauce. Fun finger food. Peking duck spring rolls ($9) have five variations using cucumber, scallion, tempura asparagus, pickled shimeji mushrooms and pomegranate hoisin.

Main plates ran the gamut from fish to fowl. Sweet-and-sour pork ($14) is the typical crispy battered pork, onions and bell peppers. What distinguished the dish were tiny balls of honeydew and cantaloupe melons that accentuated the pork flavor.

The star dish was the Peking duck ($29). Golden-brown and crisp yet succulent, the deeply flavored duck had been split, sliced and arranged on a platter for easy handling. The duck was served with steamed lotus buns, scallions, cucumbers, kumquat preserves and pomegranate hoisin.

Diver scallops and prawns ($18) was the least satisfying dish with toy box squash, cauliflower florets, beech mushrooms, baby carrots and golden chives. Pretty presentation but I counted only two scallops and three prawns. The crispy flounder fillets ($16) were flavorful, crisp and plentiful, but a tad too salty.

The Yu Sang eggplant ($9) made an excellent side dish, both spicy and garlicky.

Desserts were worthwhile. The pineapple layer cake ($8) featured pineapple pastry cream, a vanilla wafer cookie, charred pineapple and rock sugar caramel with just the right amount of sweetness. Also enjoyable was "coffee and waffles" ($8) with coffee ice cream, vanilla bean, cinnamon strudel and mint crème fraîche. The crème fraîche should have been omitted, though.

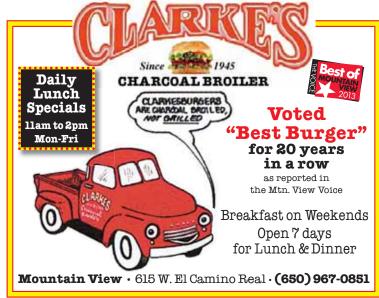

Mandarin Roots also serves specialty cocktails (all $10), which range from the classic Manhattan to a "Pink Paradise" with coconut rum, amaretto, orange and cranberry juice. The wine list was meager but offered a decent enough selection. The restaurant also has about a dozen beers, draft and bottled.

Service was very attentive and generally knowledgeable, although on one visit the waiter made repeated trips to the kitchen for answers (better than guessing though).

Fusion or not, Mandarin enough or not, the food was decidedly good, the ambiance contemporary and Mandarin Roots is a good choice for larger parties as well as more intimate dining.

Kelly Reilly and Brendan Gleeson in "Calvary".

CALVARY ★★★

(Palo Alto Square, Century 20) To believe or not to believe: That is the question of religious faith. And while the Catholic Church, battered by scandal, may be waning, it remains that you can take the man out of Catholicism, but not Catholicism out of the man. Just ask John Michael McDonagh, writer-director of "Calvary."

Set in Ireland (land of the English-born McDonagh's ancestors), "Calvary" is a tale of fear and helplessness laced with blackest humor. The resulting mystery-play-goesmystery-movie allegory may have a heavy hand, but it also has its finger on the pulse of the struggles facing the Church and the emotional needs of its drifting parishioners.

In a typically commanding performance, the great Brendan Gleeson stars as Father James Lavelle, a basically kindly sort who meets a ghastly challenge in the film's opening moments. Behind the obscuring screen of a confessional, one of Father James' parishioners "confesses" that he was raped, beginning at the age of 7, by a long-dead priest. To send a message, the parishioner promises to kill Father James in a week's time.

So begin the stations (mercifully reduced to seven) of Father James' cross. As James slouches towards Calvary, he begins squinting at each parishioner he visits, wondering, "Could this be the man who intends to kill me?" And yet, Father James is there less to interrogate and more to serve as psychologist and helping hand, despite commonly meeting with resistance, ingratitude and hostility. In his way, Father James is a comfort to everyone, even those who hate him. Yep, he's willing to die for his parishioners' sins.

The episodic structure can be wearying, but the suspects comprise a fine collection of character actors given gleefully inappropriate things to say, from a still-kicking M. Emmet Walsh ("Blood Simple") as an American writer to Chris O'Dowd (coming off his Tonynominated work in "Of Mice and Men") as a wife-beating butcher, Dylan Moran as a misanthropic millionaire to Aidan Gillen ("Game of Thrones") as a nastily cynical doctor, not to mention that adulterous mechanic from the Ivory Coast (Isaach De Bankole of "The Limits of Control").

Father James' own issues include a depressive daughter played by Kelly Reilly of "Flight" and his own latent anger at the Church's letdowns and the situation in which he finds himself. As a feature-length grapple with the for-better-and-worse Church, "Calvary" speaks loudly and clearly to those of McDonagh's background, though the noble notion of trying to meet the challenge of Christ to live generously and humbly certainly can transcend religion.

The extremities of the language and the violence will immediately turn off many, and McDonagh's self-reflexively writerly tone (shared with brother Martin) — lines like "He's a character, huh?" — unnecessarily take us out of the narrative. Still, the provocations of "Calvary" are productive, adding up to an intriguing defense of the relevance of a good priest in a time when his profession is beleaguered.

Rated R for sexual references, language, brief strong violence and some drug use. One hour, 40 minutes.

THE GIVER ★★

(Century 16, Century 20) It's odd to watch a film about the rediscovery of love, faith, passion and color, and for the film to be so by-the-numbers colorless. That's the case with "The Giver," adapted from Lois

Lowry's entry-level dystopian science-fiction novel, published in 1993 and widely read in junior high schools.

Hollywood has aged up the novel's hero from 12 to 16, sexed up the story with more action in the climax (courtesy of "Salt" and "Clear and Present Danger" director Phillip Noyce), and beefed up a supporting role to justify the (unnecessary) casting of a paycheck-cashing Meryl Streep. Otherwise, the particulars remain in place, just listlessly.

In the seemingly utopian Community, war, discord, hunger and even inclement weather are things of the past, though the place is a wash of antiseptic sameness policed in approved clothing, daily morning medication and calls for "precision of language." At the annual Ceremony of Advancement, teen Jonas (25-year-old Brenton Thwaites) wins the respected role of Receiver because he has, according to the Chief Elder (Streep), "all four attributes: intelligence, integrity, courage and the capacity to see beyond."

Jonas will inherit the Community's memories from the previous Receiver (an extragravelly Jeff Bridges) — who accepts his rechristening as "the Giver." This oral tradition makes for the film's most interesting sequences, mostly due to the quirky presence of Bridges. As he learns the cost of the Community's peace, Jonas becomes entranced with colorful visions of sledding through snow, music and dance, and emotions including love.

Soon, Jonas realizes that he shares with his mentor a skepticism that the tradeoff was worth it, especially when the lad learns of the more sinister extremes the powers that be will indulge to preserve the peace. In these broad strokes of suppressed emotion and repressed humanity, "The Giver" has primal power as a relevant allegory for all we willfully choose to ignore out of emotional self-preservation and fearful clinging to luxuriant privilege.

The hero trio of youngsters — also including Odeya Rush as Jonas' love interest and Cameron Monaghan as their mutual buddy — come off as beautiful but bland.

It's too bad that this junior version of "Fahrenheit 451" turned out drippy, but it's not entirely witless.

Rated PG-13 for a mature thematic image and some sci-fi action/violence. One hour, 34 minutes.
