Hands-on experience at top restaurants made all the difference for local chef John Shelsta

■ FOOD FEATURE

It all started with a grilled cheese sandwich: two slices of Wonderbread, Kraft cheese singles and some Mrs. Dash seasoning. John Shelsta said he was a 24-year-old with no clear path, beyond a plan to enlist in the U.S. Army if he couldn't decide on a career by age 25. But the friend who ate the grilled cheese sandwich offered a revelation that would change his life: "Wow, you should cook for a living."

One week later, Shelsta was enrolled in culinary school.

Shelsta is now running the kitchen at Howie's Artisan Pizza in Redwood City with several years of cooking and baking experience at top Peninsula and San Francisco spots under his belt. And Shelsta is a self-made chef: Despite his initial enrollment in culinary school, he soon dropped out, finding the experience of working in kitchens much more impactful (and less expensive) than the classroom.

John Shelsta found his calling in the kitchen. After years of learning on the job, he's now chef at the new Howie's Artisan Pizza in Redwood City.

Chef John Shelsta says he hopes to open a top-notch pastry shop on the Peninsula one day.

Shelsta, who grew up in Menlo Park, remembers early exposure to cooking from scratch at his private middle school, Waldorf School of the Peninsula in Los Altos Hills, where farming and gardening are central to school curriculum. Shelsta said his middle-school classes would cook meals from the school garden five days a week. Shelsta went on to attend Menlo-Atherton High School, but graduated from Sequoia High School.

Fast-forward to his first day as a culinary student at the Art Institute of California in Sunnyvale, when Shelsta asked a friend who used to work in restaurants if he knew any local places where he could work for free. His friend set him up at Marché, a now-shuttered fine-dining French restaurant in downtown Menlo Park. Marché, named one of the top 25 restaurants in the Bay Area by the Michelin Guide, closed in 2011.

“My first day of culinary school was my first day in a restaurant and I instantly fell in love,” Shelsta said.

He said he spent nearly all waking hours of the next year on cooking. He would get up at 5 a.m. to get to culinary school by 6 a.m., finish by 2 p.m., work at Marché until 10 or 11 p.m., go home and do homework, and do it all over again the next day. Sometimes he would go in early to Marché to test out recipes he had read about.

But school was taking a financial toll, and Shelsta questioned whether finishing the program was worth it.

“For me, I don’t feel like it’s very practical or necessary for the culinary field because with or without a degree you always start in the same place: $10 an hour, peeling vegetables, cleaning lettuce,” Shelsta said. “I even asked some of my teachers at my school. I said, ‘You know, if I had a year experience in a kitchen or if I had just finished culinary school, if there was one of each of us, who would you rather hire?’ Half the teachers were like, ‘The person with one year (of) experience because they already know what they’re doing.’”

Howie Bulka, then the owner of Marché, became Shelsta’s mentor and urged him to quit school. Shelsta said he spent a lot of time cold-calling restaurants, asking if they needed any volunteer help so he could gain experience.

Shelsta remained close to Bulka. He helped to open the first Howie's at Town & Country Village, went on a hiatus to cook elsewhere, and then returned as a sous chef for a year and a half. He was starting to get into baking, and Bulka urged him to dedicate a year to learning about pastry.

Shelsta spent what must have been a glorious year working in pastry at various spots throughout the Bay Area. First up was a startup bakery in San Francisco called Tell Tale Preserve Company. Don't recognize the name? Founder William Werner's next venture is better known, the wildly popular Craftsman and Wolves.

Next, Shelsta spent about a year working one-on-one with San Francisco pastry darling Belinda Leong — before her name would become synonymous with her masterful kouign amanns, currently sold out of her brick-and-mortar Pacific Heights bakery, b. patisserie.

Leong, who started her career at Gary Danko in San Francisco and left a post at Manresa in Los Gatos to pursue her own dreams, was an "open book with all of her knowledge," Shelsta said. She encouraged his creative freedom and growth, allowing him to come in early or stay late to use her equipment to experiment.

"I think with Belinda what I really learned is not trying to over-complicate things," Shelsta said. "I think sometimes people, especially now, try to make things really fancy and almost overdress things, when at the end of the day, people like the classics because they're tried and true and there's nothing wrong with that."

Just as Leong found the space for b. patisserie, Shelsta's culinary school loans were catching up with him and he left for a higher-paying job. He spent time as the pastry chef at Michelin-starred Chez TJ in Mountain View and the now-closed Station 1 in Woodside before returning to help Bulka open Howie's No. 2 in downtown Redwood City.

On Shelsta's days off — or when he should be sleeping — you might find him slaving over a sourdough bread recipe or agonizing over how to make the perfect lemon loaf. When he first started making bread, he said he went through close to 500 pounds of flour in six or seven months. He would work all night, drive home and then bake until the wee hours of the morning.

And Howie's is bearing the fruits of this labor. On weekends, Shelsta bakes several special pastries that appear on the brunch menu. It's an iteration of pop-up bake sales Shelsta started doing several years ago, first at the parking lot outside Station 1 in Woodside, and later at Zola in Palo Alto. Shelsta got to know Zola chef-owner Guillaume Bienaimé at Marché, and also helped open the French restaurant last year.

On a recent weekend morning, the "breakfast bakeshop" at Howie's was serving up whole wheat toast, buttermilk biscuits (the recipe is provided on the back of the brunch menus), toasted English muffins, blueberry muffins, cinnamon streusel coffee cake and, of course, kouign amann ($3.50 each). Don't miss the kouign amanns, a flaky, buttery puff pastry-like delicacy coated with caramelized sugar. Shelsta learned from the greats, and it shows.

The muffin and coffee cake were not too sweet, and walk the fine line between density and moistness.

Order the "two eggs as you like them" brunch entree, and you'll get to choose one of the baked goods as a side dish. I highly recommend the whole wheat toast and buttermilk biscuits — perfect vehicles for butter, jam and sopping up the yolks from two perfectly poached eggs. The toast particularly stood out with a chewy, soft density reminiscent of sourdough bread.

Other pastries that have made an appearance on the weekend brunch menu include chocolate croissants, bacon and onion brioche tarts, and fruit custard brioche tarts. Perhaps at a future date diners will see the perfect lemon pound cake Shelsta has been tirelessly tinkering with in his spare time.

Everything at Howie's is made from scratch and built upon the philosophy of "simple things done impeccably well," Shelsta said.

Ask Shelsta where he goes for a quality pastry on the Peninsula, and he's hard-pressed to give you an answer. He does mention Voyageur du Temps in Los Altos, but otherwise, he drives up to San Francisco to places like b. patisserie or Neighbor Bakehouse.

"It's kind of unfortunate that the Peninsula, it's kind of lacking. There are some big gaps in that field," he said.

Perhaps Shelsta will be the one to change that. He said he plans to spend a few more years at Howie's before opening his own restaurant with an in-house bakery on the Peninsula.

"In a perfect world, I would love to see that be my next step — to open up something around here, to service the community I grew up in," he said. ▣

The bite in the Apple

'STEVE JOBS' DOCUMENTARY A HARSH APPRAISAL

★★ 1/2 (Aquarius)

Prolific documentarian Alex Gibney has, in various films, tackled WikiLeaks and Enron, the Catholic Church and Lance Armstrong, Scientology and Sinatra. Now, his skeptical, withering gaze has landed on Steve Jobs, Apple's co-founder (and erstwhile chairman and CEO), resulting in the part-film essay, part hatchet-job "Steve Jobs: The Man in the Machine."

Longtime Palo Alto resident Jobs remains one of the most famous American public figures of our time, one of the main men credited for shoring up modern Silicon Valley and sustaining its tech boom. Gibney sets out by taking Jobs' "genius" as a given, only perfunctorily investigating and defining it. The filmmaker devotes most of his new film's running time to Jobs' ruthlessness in his professional and personal lives, his demons and his sins.

This is the man behind the machines: a man who stole credit and compensation not owed to him, a man who initially denied parentage of his daughter and only reluctantly offered her financial and emotional support, a man who outsourced production and countenanced endangerment of his employees abroad, a slave-driver insensitive to employees and lovers, and a Machiavellian capitalist who violated ethics by hiding his financial crimes and, in the end, his terminal illness.

"Steve Jobs: The Man in the Machine" has the slick production values we've come to expect out of the Gibney pipeline, and each dark episode in Jobs' life unfolds coherently in Gibney's own narration, expertly culled vintage footage and incisive talking-head interviews with various of Jobs' intimates. It may help to view "The Man in the Machine" as a cinematic essay, framed as it is by Gibney wondering aloud why strangers so felt the 2011 loss of Jobs, what his machines mean to us, and how to reconcile the man's contradictions as a self-styled spiritual creative who practiced a rapacious selfishness with money, power, prestige and legacy.

COURTESY NORMAN SEEFF

Documentary filmmaker Alex Gibney sets his sights on Steve Jobs with an incisive look at the Apple founder's dark side. "Steve Jobs: The Man in the Machine" draws upon interviews and archival footage for its portrait of the Silicon Valley icon.

These are good questions, but Gibney's film feels less than evenhanded in name-checking Jobs as a "genius" without spending any time meaningfully exploring Jobs' personal contributions to the products so many of us, in Gibney's word, "love." As such, no one will mistake the film as definitive, except as a catalog of Jobs' worst behavior. Most viewers will probably already know most of the dirt Gibney dredges back up here, whether through recent years of journalism, Walter Isaacson's bestselling bio or the biopic starring Ashton Kutcher (stay tuned for this fall's take on Jobs with Michael Fassbender starring).

In the film's most striking moment, former Apple engineer Bob Belleville describes how, for better and worse, he played a key role in Apple history but suffered mightily in his personal life for the privilege. We can see Belleville, in real time, balancing his bitterness against his pride, and then something remarkable happens: He breaks down in wistful tears in remembrance of Jobs' inspiring force of personality. And there we recognize what's missing from the rest of Gibney's two-hour-plus bummer. For those who don't yet know of Jobs' dark side, Gibney's documentary will be a useful eye-opener, but those looking to understand what made Jobs great in almost equal proportion to his nastiness will remain in the dark. Not MPAA rated. Two hours, 8 minutes.

Lily Tomlin stars in "Grandma."

MOVIE REVIEWS

GRANDMA ★★★

Paul Weitz's "Grandma" is a tailor-made vehicle for Lily Tomlin, who plays a feminist poet and professor in Elle Reid, now stewing in depression and anger. Haunted by memories of a longtime companion, Elle ruefully dumps her decades-younger girlfriend and former student (Judy Greer) at the film's outset. When Elle's granddaughter, Sage (Julia Garner), arrives to beg a loan to pay for an abortion, the die-hard feminist grandma quickly agrees to help. Strapped financially herself, Elle has to revisit her past to find the money. The ensuing road trip lines up an impressive series of guest stars, including a mystery man (Sam Elliott) and Sage's mother, Judy (Marcia Gay Harden). The early scenes work to establish Elle's cranky bona fides, but once she's going toe-to-toe with Elliott and the always-on-fire Harden, we get the deeply felt, nuanced performances promised by the nascent Oscar buzz. Rated R for language and some sexual references. One hour, 44 minutes. — P.C.

A WALK IN THE WOODS

In Ken Kwapis' adaptation of the travel book "A Walk in the Woods," writer Bill Bryson (Robert Redford) decides to satisfy his latest wanderlust with a five-month hike of the entire 2,118-mile Appalachian Trail. His wife of 40 years, Catherine (Emma Thompson), insists that it's not safe to go alone, so Bryson calls his friends. To his chagrin, only a non-invitee responds. The pseudonymous Stephen Katz exhibits the ill health of a sedentary alcoholic, conveyed effortlessly by a grizzled Nick Nolte. These grumpy old men are agreeable company, much as the film is agreeably scenic, and there's something potentially fresh in the film's "75 is the new 55" attitude. But in addition to an awkward climax of sudden seriousness, the few funny bits and sharp lines only amount to fool's gold scattered around a claim that never satisfactorily pays off. Rated R for language and some sexual references. One hour, 44 minutes. — P.C. (Reviewed Sept. 4, 2015)

DIARY OF A TEENAGE GIRL ★★★ 1/2

Many Americans prefer to pretend adolescent female desire doesn't exist. Respect, then, to writer-director Marielle Heller for her adaptation of the novel, "The Diary of a Teenage Girl." A smart, naive and red-blooded 15-year-old, protagonist Minnie Goetze finds herself doing an end-run around her oblivious mother, Charlotte (Kristen Wiig), in initiating an affair with mom's 35-year-old boyfriend, Monroe (Alexander Skarsgård). In Heller's honest and nuanced presentation, Minnie doesn't fall into the archetype of a sick nymphet or victim, and Monroe isn't simply branded as a creep. While they're almost certainly making a mistake, it's the kind of mistake they're likely to look back on with a rueful appreciation of how it shaped their characters. Rated R for strong sexual content including dialogue, graphic nudity, drug use, language and drinking — all involving teens. One hour, 42 minutes. — P.C.

WE ARE YOUR FRIENDS ★

In what feels a lot like "Entourage, Jr.," the electronic dance music-themed drama "We Are Your Friends" centers on 23-year-old DJ Cole Carter (Zac Efron), who dreams of making it big in Los Angeles. He gets his chance when world-renowned DJ James Reed (Wes Bentley) deigns to take him under his wing. To complicate things, Cole flirts with James' girlfriend and personal assistant, Sophie (Emily Ratajowski), and the two end up running around in a music-video-esque montage that resolves in a hotel-suite love scene. The passage displays the film's consistent tendency for visual clichés: Nearly every scene looks and feels like an advertisement. "We Are Your Friends" constitutes a naked attempt to commodify youth culture via the big screen. Rated R for language throughout, drug use, sexual content and some nudity. One hour, 36 minutes. — P.C.
