LOCAL EXPERTS DISH ON HOW TO CREATE THE ULTIMATE CHEESE BOARD

Artfully arranged, a cheese plate can consist of fresh and/or dried fruits, olives, nuts, cured meats, crackers and, of course, cheese.

But it takes more than just chunking up cheddar into cubes or scattering crackers around a wedge of Gouda to assemble a quality cheese plate.

The endless types of cheese and various accompaniments that create a spread can make the task a little overwhelming, so we sought tips from local meat and cheese experts on how to craft an elegant cheese board that will charm your party guests — and their tastebuds.

WHAT TO BUY

To assemble a fall cheese board, incorporate the character of the season, said Kai Rasmussen, store manager of The Milk Pail Market in Mountain View. One of Rasmussen's fall recommendations is Gjetost, a cheese from Norway that is primarily made with whey and cow and goat milk.

"It's a very unusual cheese because it's kind of caramelized so it doesn't really taste like a normal cheese," Rasmussen said. "It's almost kind of sweet but it has a rich flavor that I feel is reminiscent of fall."

Another fall option is Wensleydale, a handmade cheese studded with cranberries. (It gets its name from a style of cheese originally produced in Wensleydale in North Yorkshire, England.)

"Wensleydale is a drier English cheese," Rasmussen said, but the cranberries, characteristic of fall and holiday cooking, add a sweetness to the cheese's dry and crumbly texture.

Other cheeses to consider: Fourme d'Ambert, a raw cow's milk cheese from the Auvergne region of France (it also works well with the Gjetost, Rasmussen said) and manchego, a strong Spanish cheese made from sheep's milk.

John Nava, general manager and cheese buyer for Sigona's Farmers Market at Stanford Shopping Center, looks to the old English rhyme often used for brides — "something old, something new and something blue" — to craft a cheese plate.

"Have a strong presence of blue cheese," Nava recommended, adding that his favorite is "Big Rock Blue" from Paso Robles-based Central Coast Creamery, a small-batch creamery that specializes in aged cow's and goat's milk cheeses. The blue cheese, which is ivory in color and laced with teal veining, has a mild and approachable flavor, he said.

"It's a universal blue and it's got one or two notes," Nava said as he nibbled on a sample. "You taste the blue, then it fades and then you taste the creaminess. It has a lingering blue on the backend but it's not overpowering."

For something "old," Nava recommends a seven-year aged Wisconsin white cheddar, which packs an intense flavor because it's been aged for so long, he said. It's "big and bold upfront," but bitter on the backend, Nava said. The cheddar has a firm texture but becomes smooth and creamy once eaten.

And for something "new," Nava enjoys Ewenique, a sheep's milk cheese made in Holland (also produced at Central Coast Creamery). The cheese is ivory-white in color with a delicate texture. The flavor is earthy and sweet with a rich finish.

Other cheeses to look for: "Moo-Na Lisa" (Sigona's private label), a Gouda-Gruyere cheese; truffle Gouda, a creamy and luxurious cheese infused with black truffles; and Fromager d'Affinois, a French double-cream soft cheese made from cow's milk.

Nava suggests serving enough of each type of cheese so that all guests can taste them, adding that the best cheese boards are diverse. If you're serving a small party (five people), choose four to five types of cheese.

Expert's tip: For an easy and impressive treat to include on a cheese board, purchase Medjool dates and stuff them with mascarpone cheese and walnuts, then top with salt. (If you're going high-end, Nava suggests "Salt of the Earth," a 600-million-year-old salt from West Virginia.)

ACCOMPANIMENTS

Once you've decided on which cheeses to serve, it's time to pick the accompaniments. Rasmussen keeps a seasonal eye, so in the fall looks to fresh red and green grapes, pears and quince or quince paste, a sweet, thick jelly made from the pulp of the quince fruit. Or, serve fried and salted Marcona almonds for a salty crunch. Partner the cheeses with honey, which complements the salty nature of cheese and crackers. Rasmussen recommends serving a thinner cracker "so you can taste the cheese more."

For carnivores, cured meat can add substance to the cheese and act as a perfect vehicle for spreads.

Mark Dittmer, whose father owns Dittmer's Gourmet Meats & Wurst-Haus in Los Altos, recommends doubled-smoked paprika sausages (a Dittmer speciality), whose spice and heat goes well with white cheese or cheddar, he said.

"Especially with our heavy smoked stuff I like (a) nice mild cheese," said Dittmer, who suggests slicing links into quarter-inch-thick coins for serving.

Consider these other meats at Dittmer's for your cheese plate: German salami, Italian salami, pepperoni and prosciutto.

For sweeter accompaniments, Dittmer recommends a spreadable chutney or jam, including red currant, quince or lingonberry to add a contrasting flavor to the fatty, salty meats.

For garnishes, place pickles, olives and other acidic accompaniments next to the meats, Dittmer suggested.

Omar Cruz slices into Jarlsberg cheese in the kitchen of Dittmer's Gourmet Meats & Wurst-Haus in Los Altos.

where you are just going to scoop, on the marble side," she said.

And don't forget about the knives, said King, who recommends putting out a few different kinds.

Spreadable cheeses such as brie or goat work best with a spreader or butter knife, while harder cheeses like parmesan work well with a square-shaped knife, she said. And for softer cheeses, like cheddar, King prefers a soft-cheese knife with a forked end to pick up the slices.

King also recommends putting out small serving bowls filled with olives and almonds to add warmth and texture, as well as placing cheese markers in the cheeses with the names so guests know what they're trying.

"The biggest thing is to have color," King said. She recommends placing a combination of red and green grapes on the board or serving cheese on serving paper that resembles a slice of wood or leaves.

Expert's tip: Let the cheese sit out before serving time, Milk Pail Market's Rasmussen said. "Let them get adjusted to (room) temperature, otherwise it's a little too cold or too hard (to serve)." ▣

PRESENTATION

Cheese is best displayed on a natural surface, including wood, slate or marble, said Alison King, a sales associate at Sur La Table at Town & Country Village in Palo Alto. King prefers an olivewood cheese board because of the wood's natural beauty, but "it's a little more expensive because the wood is rare," she noted.

A cheaper alternative is an acacia wood cheese paddle, which features a natural grain pattern and provides a rustic backdrop for the cheese.

Slate cheese boards are also a good option — and double as a writing surface. You can use chalk to write the names of the cheese directly on the slate.

Another favorite of King's are boards made of half wood and half marble.

"You can put certain cheeses you'll be slicing on the wooden side and other ones like brie,

AGE AND GENDER POLITICS COLLIDE IN 'THE INTERN'

★★ (Century 16, Century 20)

"The Intern," from writer-director Nancy Meyers ("It's Complicated"), offers up two movie stars in likable mode, a sunny Hollywood sheen and a novel premise. Yet there's something vaguely unsettling about how this mildly amusing comedy gets tangled up in political (in)correctness.

Robert De Niro plays cuddly 70-year-old widower Ben Whitaker, who has tried and found wanting all forms of post-retirement occupation, from Mandarin classes to a one-night-stand with his enthusiastic Brooklyn neighbor (Linda Lavin). When Ben gets wind of the Senior Internship Program at e-commerce fashion outfit About the Fit, he submits a video resume and gets not only the gig but also a plum assignment assisting the company's founder and president, Jules Ostin (Anne Hathaway).

Naturally, Jules voices skepticism about both the intern program (which she has forgotten she agreed to) and her own need for an intern. For Jules' primary character flaw is her need to micromanage, which results in her being overwhelmed and under-focused on the long-term needs of her 18-month-old company, as well as on shaky ground in her marriage to her supportive but restless husband, Matt (Anders Holm). As serious talk emerges of installing a CEO who isn't Jules, the pressure's on.

To the extent that "The Intern" is Ben's story, the picture functions as a politically correct object lesson in anti-age discrimination. As such, it's a tale worth telling.

Where Meyers has more obvious trouble is in balancing the characters: she fashions Ben as a basically flawless paragon and Jules as a gifted flibbertigibbet. Jules needn't necessarily stand for all professional women, but when she meets a time-sensitive professional crisis with wildly unprofessional behavior, letting her personal life take precedence and assigning staffers to solve her problem (while lauding Ben for being an old-school man of character), it's hard not to feel there's something regressive about the film's gender politics.

Add how "The Intern" semi-anachronistically characterizes a guy who was in his prime in the late-'60s as a retro-metrosexual with pocket squares and handkerchiefs, and you realize you're either going to give up or give in to "The Intern" and its cheery workplace fantasy.

Rated PG-13 for some suggestive content and brief strong language. Two hours, one minute.

IT'S FISCHER VS. SPASSKY IN 'PAWN SACRIFICE'

★★ 1/2 (Aquarius, Century 20)

International chess champion Bobby Fischer was as enigmatic as the game he played, which makes him a figure well-suited to a screen drama. And yet it is only now — seven years after his death — that we get a major motion picture about the man who may have been the greatest chess player of all time. "Pawn Sacrifice" casts Tobey Maguire as Fischer in a Cold War drama that builds to his most famous match.

As scripted by Steven Knight ("Eastern Promises"), "Pawn Sacrifice" establishes Fischer's credentials as a boy chess prodigy under the wing of a mother (Robin Weigert) bemused by his gift. Maguire takes over the leading role in 1962, when the still-teenage Fischer (already a multiple record-breaker) competed in the 15th Chess Olympiad in Bulgaria.

Maguire isn't obvious casting,

Liev Schreiber as Boris Spassky and Tobey Maguire as Bobby Fischer in "Pawn Sacrifice."

but he convincingly owns the role of the incredibly difficult, mentally unstable Grandmaster. Fischer seems both at home in a championship culture of aggressive arrogance and mentally tortured by the game's maddening strategic variables. As his adviser and sparring partner, Father Bill Lombardy (Peter Sarsgaard), puts it, "This game — it's a rabbit hole ... it can take you very close to the edge."

That's never truer than in the high-stakes atmosphere surrounding Fischer's 1972 match-up with Russian Grandmaster and World Champion Boris Spassky (Liev Schreiber) in Iceland. Described in the film as "World War III on a chessboard," it took on patriotic significance, with Fischer serving as America's symbolic hope to disprove "Soviet intellectual superiority over the decadent West."

Director Edward Zwick ("Glory") doesn't get in the way of a good story and gets typically fine work from Schreiber, as well as from Sarsgaard and Michael Stuhlbarg as Fischer's manager/lawyer Paul Marshall. Some of the film's smartest scenes find Lombardy and Marshall troubleshooting their "rock star" charge, as when the former argues to the latter that giving Fischer drugs to treat his paranoia and delusional psychosis "would be like pouring concrete down a holy well."

The at-times shallow "Pawn Sacrifice" flirts with simplifying its story to a nationalistic triumph of patriotism and education, but the diseased mind of its antihero and his ignominious end lend the film an appropriately haunting ellipsis.
