

A new kind of burger

Impossible Foods creates a plant-based burger that tastes impossibly like meat

FOOD FEATURE

What if plants could actually mimic the flavor and texture of meat? Many have attempted it with varying degrees of success, as most of us who have tried a dry and uninspiring veggie burger can attest. At best, it tastes good, but does not taste remotely like meat. At worst, there's the resignation that nothing will ever truly compare.

Certainly, it's difficult to convince meat-lovers that anything could fully resemble the sensory experience involved, from the sizzle of the patty on a hot grill to the charred, caramel aroma that permeates the air, to that first, juicy bite of a burger that's still slightly pink in the center. Only in the fictional world of "Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory" could Oompa Loompas in white lab coats achieve the impossible by creating chewing gum that tasted like a scrumptious dinner.

But this is Silicon Valley, where scientists in lab coats really do seek to achieve the impossible, albeit without the wonky blue wigs.

While on sabbatical from teaching at Stanford University School of Medicine, biologist Pat Brown, the founder and chief executive officer of Impossible Foods, sought to find a solution to a big problem.

"I decided that problem was the use of animals as food technology. (It) is by far the greatest threat to the global environment right now, and it was apparent that nobody was really making a serious effort to treat it as a solvable problem," Brown said in an open house for media outlets on Oct. 6.

People around the world who love meat, fish and dairy foods are not going to stop eating them, creating a tremendous demand for food whose production is causing an ongoing environmental catastrophe, he said.

Rebekah Moses, Impossible Foods' senior sustainability analyst, shed light on the environmental impact of beef consumption by giving the example of one single cow. According to Moses, this cow is alive for 1.5 to two years, during which it's walking around, burning calories and emitting methane gas. By the time it gets to the plate, it has consumed 12 pounds of grain for every pound of beef.

In terms of land use, about 30 percent of the ice-free surface of the planet is devoted to producing animals directly, Moses said. As for freshwater use, about 25 percent goes into animal agriculture, about the same level of emissions as is produced by the entire transportation industry — planes, trains, cars and rockets included.

This was what led Pat Brown to establish Impossible Foods in 2011.

"So animals are really, if you think about it, just a technology for transforming plants into meat, fish and dairy foods," Brown said. "We had the opportunity to basically take a fresh look at that problem and say, 'OK, if you were in 2016 trying to come up with the best possible way to make this category of foods sustainably, affordably, scalably, delicious, optimized for nutrition and so forth, how would you do it?' Well, the last thing you would probably ever think of is, 'Let's just put plants into animals and kill them and eat them," he said.

So Brown took a 21st century approach to solving a 21st century problem. He and his group of scientists have spent the past five years developing a fundamental molecular understanding of what makes meat, meat.

'We believe a great burger belongs in the hands of a great chef.'

Pat Brown, founder and CEO of Impossible Foods, talks with reporters during an open house at the Redwood City-based company.

Textured wheat and potato proteins form the vegetable base of the Impossible Burger.

The Impossible Burger in its raw form reveals the blood-red color of the burger's signature ingredient, heme, a protein that gives ground beef burgers their signature taste, yet also exists in plants. Impossible Foods extracts heme from fermented yeast.

Celeste Holz-Schietinger, Impossible Foods' principal scientist, demonstrated assembling a burger, which the company chose as its flagship product.

"We chose ground beef — the burger. It is central to American culture and so many other cultures as well. It's also something that we thought we could do, even though very difficult," she said.

According to Holz-Schietinger, one of the first things the scientists noticed is that meat is made up of transitions: in color, from red to brown; in texture, from squishy to chewy; in flavor, from blandly sweet and metallic to roasted, caramelized notes.

Based on this observation, they used science to tackle the "meat experience."

The burger Holz-Schietinger assembled started with water, wheat and potato protein. But the truly novel secret ingredient was the heme protein, which makes blood red and allows for us to breathe and hold oxygen. It's found in muscles and in most plants as well.

"For us, what we identified and had never been discovered before was that to create meat flavor, all of those aromas that take place upon cooking, heme is what drives that and what creates that," she said.

In fact, when in the presence of heme, the nutrients, amino acids, proteins and sugars in beef react to create the aromas and the meat flavor, she explained.

Smita Shankar, principal scientist at Impossible Foods, explained that in order to sustainably produce heme, they use a fermentation process similar to what is used in making certain types of beers. The DNA sequence of the heme molecule is expressed in the yeast, which is engineered to make heme. It is then extracted from the yeast cells and filtered so that there is no yeast in the final product.

After adding the heme, Holz-Schietinger added coconut oil, which has a similar melting property as tallow from an animal, she explained. This “fat release” combined with a soy protein controls how the burger cooks as well as its melting profiles. It also contributes to what Holz-Schietinger described as the “mouth-coat” or “mouth-feel” of ground beef.

Glycogen, a carbohydrate; konjac, also known as Japanese yam; and xanthan gum are added to contribute to holding the ground beef together.

Inside the lab, scientists use various instruments and machines to gather data on the molecules and components that make meat smell, taste, feel and behave the way that it does under various conditions and temperatures.

Pavel Aronov, principal scientist at Impossible Foods, stands in front of a GCMS mass spectronomy machine that is used to measure alcohol in blood samples or to detect traces of flammable liquids at suspected arson sites. At Impossible Foods, this machine is used to identify the flavor molecules in food.

“One of the discoveries that we made here at Impossible Foods is that there is no one molecule that smells like beef When we take this complex flavor and separate it out into each of its individual components, none of these molecules smells like beef,” Aronov said.

Across the lab, past beakers and scales and stainless steel equipment, Sergey Solomatin, principal scientist, explains how various machines help to collect data about the texture of meat. One machine measures the force needed to puncture a piece of meat while another measures how beef firms up as it’s being cooked, and yet another collects data on how fat melts. All of this data characterizing animal meat and its components and behavior helps scientists find plant components that produce the same behavior.

As of now, Impossible Foods is partnering with restaurants and top chefs, the first of which was Chef David Chang’s restaurant Momofuku Nishi in New York City.

“We believe a great burger belongs in the hands of a great chef,” said David Lee, chief operating officer and chief financial officer of Impossible Foods. “Only the impossible burger has the same molecule that makes red meat look and taste and sizzle and smell . . . like a burger”

Though it may be a while before the Impossible Burger’s ground beef is available at your local grocery store, the scientists continue to push the boundaries of the impossible as they look to re-create other meat, fish and dairy products in the most scalable, environmentally conscious and nutritious way. ▣

Ben Affleck and Anna Kendrick star in the number-crunching thriller, "The Accountant."

Zero-Sum Lame

BEN AFFLECK PLAYS AUTISTIC ASSASSIN 'THE ACCOUNTANT'

★ (Century 16 and 20)

Nothing says action-thriller like accounting. Of course, that's half of the gag of "The Accountant," in which a serious button-down number-cruncher — complete with pocket protector — mass murders bad guys when handling "black money" for shady customers.

The other half of the gag is that the accountant has "a high-functioning form of autism." Screenwriter Bill Dubuque ("The Judge") rations out the personal history of Christian Wolff (Seth Lee) as the troubled child of a tough-loving Army Psych Ops officer dad (Robert C. Treveiler) and a straying mom (Mary Kraft). In the present day, Christian is a beefy Ben Affleck, keeping up appearances as a mild-mannered strip-mall accountant when not cooking books for big-time criminal players or knocking them off when "someone breaks his moral code." Any of this sound appealing so far?

So the U.S. Treasury is on to Wolff, with Director Raymond King (J.K. Simmons) taking a personal interest. King blackmails talented analyst Marybeth Medina (Cynthia Addai-Robinson) into cracking the case (mostly, it seems, by Googling his aliases and gawking at the results). Meanwhile, Wolff nabs a gig as a forensic accountant for Living Robotics, where CEO Lamar Black (John Lithgow) has recently discovered millions embezzled; there, Wolff takes a shine to awkwardly perky accountant Dana Cummings (Anna Kendrick). Plus there's another mystery man (Jon Bernthal) going around confronting fiscal crooks and on a collision course with Wolff.

So "The Accountant" doesn't lack for plot over the course of its 128 minutes. But director Gavin O'Connor ("Warrior") doesn't seem to know how to make this material compelling, and who can blame him? Sometimes "The Accountant" plays like "Batman Begins," with young Christian suffering personal trauma and punishingly learning martial arts. At other times, Affleck seems to be auditioning for his old buddy Matt Damon's "Bourne" franchise (by way of their "Good Will Hunting") with his brutally efficient take downs by hand-to-hand combat or sniper artillery (when not covering walls with equations).

Strangest of all, much of the time "The Accountant" is just plain goofy, inviting laughs that sometimes backfire to be at, rather than with, the film. Kendrick has obviously been asked to give a more or less romantic-comic performance that's at odds with the rest of the story, and Affleck doesn't have the chops to overcome the script's clichés and make his preposterous character credible (to be fair, I'm not sure anyone does). In playing autistic, Affleck is mostly limited to degrees of deadpan, which get played for menace and/or yuks.

"The Accountant"'s biggest sin is simply not being interesting. O'Connor overestimates the intrigue of the "puzzle" plot, which has only predictable twists in store. The independence and goal-oriented success of the autistic anti-hero is meant to be inspiring, but winds up creepy. And so the running-gag emotional expression of another of the film's autistic characters pretty much sums it up: "Heavy sigh."

Rated R for strong violence and language throughout. Two hours, 8 minutes.

Selling your home?
First, meet with Michael Repka.

Meet with Michael today for tax and legal advice before listing your home.

Unlike most real estate agents, Michael holds two law degrees and has years of experience as a real estate and tax attorney, giving his clients a unique advantage as most other brokerages do not provide an in-house attorney to help clients. In addition, the expertise and marketing available through the team at DeLeon Realty are the very best in the business. Meet with Michael to discuss any preliminary tax and legal questions about selling your home and let him tell you more about what makes DeLeon Realty's innovative approach to real estate so successful. There is no cost or obligation for this consultation. However, Homeowners that have a current listing contract with another agent are excluded.

Our success comes from the value we place on the relationship with the clients we serve.

“Among The AW Team’s many strengths is their sense of the Mid-Peninsula market, ability to bring multiple opportunities to both buyers and sellers and unique analytical approach to help.” — Clifford C.

“The AW Team was far more interested in helping me make the best decision for my family than just completing the sale, for which I am very grateful. Their recommendation to wait a year before selling my property paid off, as the market rose dramatically during that time. Their exceptional knowledge of the fast-moving Mid-Peninsula market enabled me to understand the strengths and challenges of a seller. They explained and helped me through every aspect of each transaction, while letting me make the final decisions. They also are very innovative in their marketing and networking to create the best opportunities for clients. Having worked with Adam and Wendy on several transactions, I highly recommend them as trusted, client-focused real estate professionals who will deliver results.” — Constance B.

“The AW Team has clients’ best interests in mind throughout the entire real estate transaction process. In our case, Adam and Wendy encouraged us to be patient and not rush into just any purchase. They provided thorough research on comparable homes, supply and demand, and existing offers to determine reasonable market pricing specific to the Mid-Peninsula, then guided us on the pros and cons of each specific property. Their team approach, attention to detail, and overall knowledge not only helped us understand and navigate the Mid-Peninsula’s challenging real estate market, but gave us confidence in our decision and purchase. We have already recommended The AW Team to friends!” — Lisa C.
