The Oshman Family JCC in Palo Alto debuted Nourish: A Newish Jewish Cafe earlier this year.

The nonprofit JCC is home to many different services, including its own preschool, gym and entertainment offerings for those in the Jewish community living on the Midpeninsula. And while it previously housed a cafe, the JCC opened Nourish in July with a goal to offer the community something unique.

At Nourish, you might overhear conversations spoken in Hebrew, but you will also see customers hard at work on their laptops and enjoying a snack, similar to what you see in any local Starbucks. That being said, the goal has always been to give the local Jewish community a place to meet others and foster new friendships, said Sally Porush, the JCC's chief people officer.

“What we’re trying to do is have a place for our community to come together,” she said.

Key to the success of the new cafe, said Porush, was bringing someone on board with strong restaurant experience.

Porush found her answer in Robert Stayte, whose experience in the food industry includes time as catering director for the University of California, Berkeley as well as years of working in corporate dining.

Stayte described the food he makes at Nourish as “Jewish cuisine with a twist,” adding that he takes inspiration from traditional Israeli, New York deli and California cuisine. For example, one of the most popular dishes at the cafe is a play on In-N-Out Burger’s famous “animal-style” fries (French Fries topped with cheese, grilled onions and the chain’s secret sauce). Stayte added his own twist by using Tater Tots instead of fries and topping them with bits of pastrami.

The menu includes a variety of flatbread pizzas and pastas, hummus plates and quesadillas. There’s also coffee from Peet’s Coffee and teas from Mighty Leaf. Nourish primarily serves breakfast and lunch, as the cafe closes at 5:30 p.m. during the week and is not open on weekends.

One of the biggest hurdles in crafting the new cafe’s menu, Stayte said, was creating items that serve kosher customers who adhere to strict guidelines around preparing and eating certain types of meat and dairy. Among Nourish’s kosher-friendly dishes are hummus topped with spiced chickpeas and a simple pasta with marinara sauce.

JCC CHIEF PEOPLE OFFICER

A customer favorite, Stayte said, is the falafel. Falafel balls are placed inside a generous piece of pita bread, surrounded by various vegetables, like tomatoes and cucumber. This is certainly one of the more traditional Jewish dishes on the menu, along with the matzo ball soup that Stayte said customers pick up in droves on Fridays to take home before the start of the Sabbath at sundown.

Robert Stayte says he’s designed the menu at Nourish to be “Jewish cuisine with a twist.”

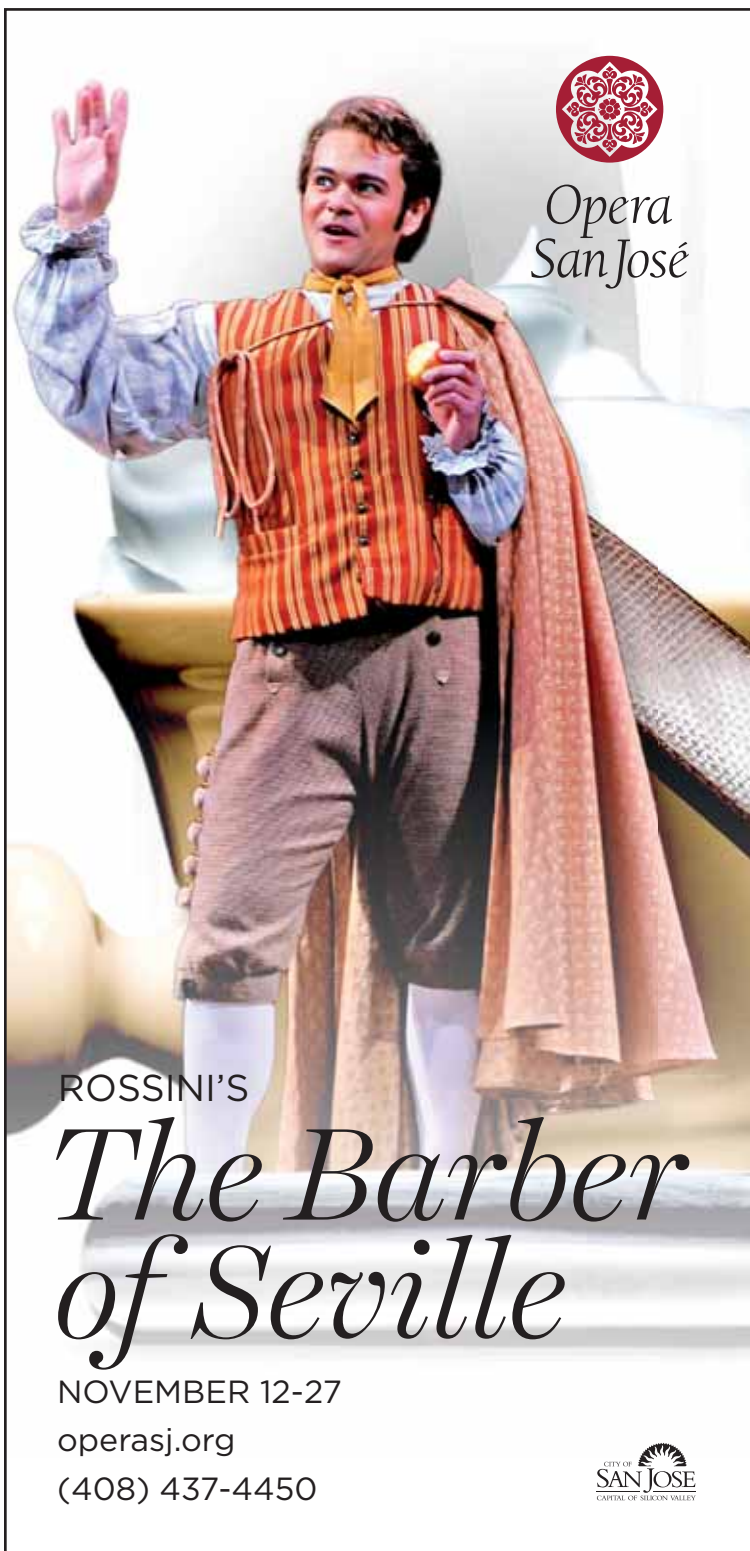

The atmosphere in Nourish is relaxed and the decor wholly modern and unique. An entire wall is covered with cheeky quotations chosen by the staff (“The optimist sees the bagel, the pessimist sees the hole”) as well as charging stations for laptops or cell phones (it is in Palo Alto, after all).

With the new addition of a desert-inspired “oasis play space” playground next to the cafe, the JCC anticipates many parents will become Nourish regulars. Parents of children who attend the nonprofit's preschool already make up a large portion of Nourish's customer base, Stayte said, adding that a lot of students from the nearby Kehillah Jewish High School frequent the cafe, especially for lunch.

Now that Stayte has a more specific audience in mind at the JCC, he finds himself enjoying the challenge. A resident of Palo Alto for more than a decade, he said he decided that Nourish was the right fit because it allowed him to pursue something new in his career. The concept forces him to come up with innovative dishes that Jewish and non-Jewish customers can enjoy equally, he said.

"I wanted to have an impact on a community by helping to create a family-friendly atmosphere and a meeting place with great food that meets the needs of our diverse population," he said. ▣

Journey, not destination

"ARRIVAL" IS SERIOUS SCIENCE-FICTION WITH A BEATING HEART

★★★★ (Century 16 & 20)

By the time you read this, the presidential election that seemed like it would never end will presumably have ended. And yet, its scariest implications about human nature will not have been resolved. Which makes election week a very fine time for Paramount Pictures to drop "Arrival," a science-fiction masterpiece that's largely about our perceptions of time and our struggles to communicate.

The film offers a deceptively simple premise: 12 alien vessels arrive, prompting governments to mobilize their first-contact responses. In the U.S., one Colonel Weber (Forest Whitaker) enlists linguistics professor Dr. Louise Banks (Amy Adams) and physicist Dr. Ian Donnelly (Jeremy Renner) to take point in posing to the aliens the all-important question: "What is your purpose on Earth?"

We've been programmed by so much of science-fiction cinema to expect a big, dumb thriller out of "Arrival." But in the hands of director Denis Villeneuve ("Sicario"), this adaptation of Ted Chiang's celebrated science-fiction short story "Story of Your Life" honors its source material by offering thoughtful provocations about how and why we live. In a marketplace in which "Star Trek" has come to sending space motorcycles flying through the air, "Arrival" is a gift not to be taken lightly.

Villeneuve sticks to his sober and shadowy aesthetic while stepping up his approach to be more deliberate and methodical than ever. Credit Eric Heisserer ("Lights Out," the 2011 "The Thing") for the smart screenplay, which helps "Arrival" play out like a more cerebral "The Abyss" or a more accessible "Interstellar." While the story has considerable ticking-clock suspense — credibly turning first contact into a Bay of Pigs-esque brink-of-war scenario — it also proves unexpectedly romantic and profound in its deeper concerns, by exploring the happy-sad nature of existence itself, of being born to die.

For as wonderfully wonky as

"Arrival" can be about language (including the Sapir-Whorf hypothesis) and putting the science back in science fiction, the story also locates the universal in the specific perspective of Banks, who has to deal with powerful personal emotions as part and parcel of talking to the aliens (similar to the professional-personal dynamic facing Clarice Starling in "The Silence of the Lambs"). Adams' gifts fit the role like a glove: she's like the beautiful reflective surface of a lake rippled by wind, her studied placidity disturbed by powers out of her control (with love perhaps the worst offender).

"Arrival" serves as a philosophical reminder of how hard humans try to order the universe and control circumstance, and as a challenge to our single-minded ways of seeing life itself. In simplest terms, this plays out in the international cooperation and lack thereof, so tenuous at a moment of potential crisis when it needs to be unshakeable. But "Arrival" runs deeper than that. In part, the film's medium is the message: Villeneuve's non-linear film language mirrors the language Banks has been sent to crack.

The film's most obvious visual symbol is the proverbial canary in the coal mine, the caged bird the U.S. contingent carries when visiting the aliens. In some ways, "Arrival" wants to be that canary: a first-responder yellow light to proceed with caution, but to proceed. Like its aliens, the film strives to teach us in this moment to think differently, to communicate more clearly, to understand ourselves better. Our planet may be at stake—certainly our stories, and the stories of our lives.

Aisholpan, a 13-year-old nomadic Mongolian girl, is the subject of the documentary, "The Eagle Huntress."

Hunting the truth

DOC DOESN'T LET TRUTH GET IN THE WAY OF A SALABLE STORY

★★ (The Guild)

Back in 1922, Robert J. Flaherty made the controversial documentary/docudrama "Nanook of the North," which he purported to be a nonfiction account of an Inuit hunter, but which included untruths, distortions and staged sequences. Now in 2016, we have Otto Bell's "The Eagle Huntress," a Disney-esque documentary bucking for awards and a big box office draw by creating an appealing story against an exotic backdrop.

"The Eagle Huntress" essays

the accomplishments of 13-year-old Aisholpan, framed by Bell as having a dream of being the first eagle huntress in Mongolia. The 2,000-year Kazakh tradition of eagle hunting remains male-dominated, making Aisholpan an outlier and, one might assume, a long shot as a competitor in the annual Golden Eagle Festival. With the full support of her family (dad and granddad are both eagle hunters), Aisholpan collects a female golden eaglet, trains her, competes in the festival and, for an encore, goes "eagle hunting" for a fox in the wintry wilds of the Mongolian steppe.

All of the above is more or less true, and certainly makes for a commercially appealing story. Pop documentarian Motrgan Spurlock and "Star Wars" star Daisy Ridley came on board as executive producers (Ridley also recorded five minutes of narration), the film sold to Sony Pictures Classics at the Sundance Film Festival, and chart-topping pop star Sia recorded original song "Angel by the Wings" for the end credits. Oscars, here we come!

Taken at face value, "The Eagle Huntress" seems to be a fine starter documentary for kids. With its G-rating and politically correct feminism, it's a family friendly, nature-themed adventure to empower girls and school boys about girl power. Unfortunately, even seen outside of any larger context, "The Eagle Huntress" smells a bit fishy. The film's interviews seem coached to give Bell the sound bites he wants (says Dad, "She is a strong and courageous girl" and her eagle "a strong bird ... it matches Aisholpan"), and certain situations or bits of dialogue feel constructed.

Those feelings are easy enough to shake off since Aisholpan makes such an impressive and sunny heroine, and the doc about her is so slick. But the narrative of Aisholpan and her supportive family struggling against closed-minded tradition misleads, and Bell sweeps under the rug any inconvenient truths that challenge his story. A little research shows that Bell had to reach far to find the harrumphing elders he depicts as clinging to rigid gender roles. The film willfully ignores the similar story of female eagle hunter Makpal Abdrazakova, and completely leaves out that Aisholpan's tutelage as an eagle hunter was suggested to her family by photographer Asher Svidensky as part of an "art project."

Stanford University's own professor Adrienne Mayor recently weighed in with her essay "The Eagle Huntress: Ancient Traditions and New Generations," and Canadian researcher Meghan Fitz-James has vigorously investigated and reported Bell's unethical practices (all of the above can be found online). The well-packaged "Eagle Huntress" boasts gorgeous photography and an appealing story of can-do spirit, but as a documentary, it's only marginally more credible than "Nanook of the North." So have we really come a long way, baby?

Rated G. One hour, 27 minutes.
