When Janet and Ruben Robles first started cooking whole chickens to bring in more business to their small Menlo Park market, they smartly set up the grill outside alongside Middlefield Road. They didn't have to do any promotion; the sight and smell alone of street-side mesquite-grilled chicken attracted customers.

They came "por el olor," Ruben said in Spanish — for the smell. Some days, the couple sold more than 300 of the spatchcocked, Michoacán-style pollos al carbon.

In 2008, the county asked them to move the grill inside, which required new permits and a renovation process that took a year, during which they couldn't sell any chicken.

"People asked every day about the chicken," Janet said in Spanish.

Now, they cook the chicken over charcoal on a large grill in the back of the small, neighborhood market, but the alluring scent of smoked-kissed meat still billows out through a vent into the surrounding streets, drawing in both longtime and new customers.

The couple opened Michoacán Produce Market in 2002. Janet, who is from the Mexican state of Michoacán, wanted to bring her home country's style of grilling chicken to the United States. But more than that, she wanted to cook something delicious, fresh and affordable for the neighborhood market's clientele, who are mostly working-class Latino families.

"My goal is to make something for people who work," she said. "The women who clean houses, who come here for their food, so they don't have to cook."

Their busiest times are weekends and holidays like Thanksgiving and Christmas. The two weeks leading up to President Donald Trump's threatened ICE raids earlier this month were strangely quiet at the market, Janet said. She thought it was an indication that people were fearful.

They've only raised the price of the chicken once, earlier this year, to compensate for the increasing cost of ingredients. They used to sell one whole chicken, which feeds four to five people, with fresh salsa, rice, beans and tortillas for $18.39. It's now $20.25, still a major steal for the amount of food and its quality. Or, you can get a chicken, salsa and tortillas for $14.79. The market accepts food stamps.

"Queremos algo para toda la gente" — "We want something for all people," Janet said.

Janet cooks the chicken, salsa,

Spanish rice and beans fresh every day. The chickens are rubbed in a secret spice mixture and grilled for 45 minutes until they're charred on the outside and juicy on the inside. She's less secretive about her salsa recipe, which includes grilled tomatillos and japones chiles, and her silky pinto beans, cooked with jalapeños, onions and a little bit of oil.

The only thing they don't make by hand is the corn tortillas; the labor would be too much for the mom-and-pop business to handle, Janet said.

But, like any good chef, she's uncompromising about quality. When fresh tomatillos go up in price, Ruben suggests that they buy canned ones instead. Janet refuses.

The market sells all the other accoutrements one might need for an epic taco feast: avocados and limes to make guacamole, chicharrones by the pound, wheels of cotija cheese, cold Jarritos and Modelo beers to drink and paletas (frozen fruit pops) for dessert.

The couple recounted a favorite story about a customer who returned after picking up a chicken to bring home to his family. The smell was so enticing he picked at the chicken on his way home until there wasn't enough left for his family, and he was sent back to the market for another one. ■

QUENTIN TARANTINO FINALLY GOES 'HOLLYWOOD'

★★★★1/2 (Century 16 & 20, Icon)

Say what you will about Quentin Tarantino, but the man makes a heady stew of a movie. His ninth, "Once Upon a Time ... in Hollywood," makes a particularly flavorful meal of its many leftover ingredients.

For this comedy-drama, Tarantino quantum-leaps back to 1969. In February, fading star Rick Dalton (Leonardo DiCaprio) laments his career. "It's official, ol' buddy," he tells his erstwhile stunt double and only friend Cliff Booth (Brad Pitt). "I'm a has-been." Dalton's salad days as the star of TV's "Bounty Law" are behind him, and after a few big-screen flops like Western "Tanner" and WWII pic "The Fourteen Fists of McCluskey," he finds himself relegated to playing the "heavy" of the week as a nomadic TV guest star. (The dynamic between the two characters is loosely based on the relationship between actor Burt Reynolds and stuntman-turned-director Hal Needham.)

Rick's nerves have given him a stuttering tic, foreshadowing trouble for his latest guest shot on "Lancer." As Rick wrestles his demons on set, Cliff does his thing in his recent capacity as Rick's driver and personal assistant. In the process, a flirtation with hitchhiking hippie chick Pussycat (Margaret Qualley) leads Cliff to old stomping grounds, the Spahn Movie Ranch, where a mysterious commune has sprung up around some guy named Charlie.

While playing out compelling scenes in the moment, Tarantino also meticulously lays the groundwork for upcoming scenes, most prominently by positioning as Rick's next-door neighbors actress Sharon Tate (Margot Robbie) and her husband, director Roman Polanski (Rafał Zawierucha). The film's second act skips ahead six months to the Summer of '69, a telling time of hope, change and peace met with violence. "Once Upon a Time...in Hollywood" takes Tarantino's nostalgia to a conclusion both logical and illogical, historic and fantastical, building to a black-comic climax that's both generous in its wishful thinking and gleeful in its ultraviolence.

True to form, Tarantino has made another exquisitely crafted film that chases poor taste and mature filmmaking with a juvenile prank as its punchline. The contradictions are part of the bargain, and "Hollywood" feels somehow both more and less than the sum of its parts depending on the wavelength you tune in to. More than anything, Tarantino's films are about their own movie-ness, and with that more true than ever in his latest film, one has to reach to coalesce universal themes. "Hollywood" is mostly about inarticulate male friendship, about the inevitability of change that comes with time, but more so about how movies are our wish fulfillment and actors suffer their insecurities and anxieties for our pleasure.

On the surface are all the signs of the usual Tarantino film from the casting — which includes Luke Perry in his final role, Damien Lewis as Steve McQueen and Nicholas Hammond (the first live-action "Spider-Man") as Sam Wanamaker — to the sidetracks, such as a monologue from Bruce Lee (Mike Moh) that leads to an impromptu exhibition match. As for Tarantino's infamous foot fetish, it's never been more blatant (all the young ladies, and a couple of the guys, prop up their bare feet).

Though the question "What the heck is this thing really about?" nags, there's no denying the greatness of Pitt's seemingly effortless comic performance and the lasting impression that he and DiCaprio are the screen team you didn't know you needed, zen cool married to restless, self-loathing ego. Again and again, Tarantino conjures up beautifully made scenes, like the hangout between Cliff and his pit bull Brandy or the slightly absurd friendship Rick strikes up with an 8-year-old method actor (Julia Butters). The film is all over the map and off the grid, set in the Hollywood of Tarantino's dreams.

Rated R for language throughout, some strong graphic violence, drug use, and sexual references. Two hours, 41 minutes.

MOVIE REVIEWS

'STUBER' ★

"Stuber" is the kind of movie that makes you feel bad for the actors. Kumail Nanjiani stars as part-time Uber driver Stu. At Stu's other job selling sporting goods, his douchebro boss (Jimmy Tatro) tauntingly dubs him "Stuber," but Stu has a much bigger concern: his dwindling star rating on the ride-sharing app. Enter brawny cop Vic Manning (Dave Bautista), whose morning LASIK surgery has rendered him temporarily seeing-impaired just as he gets a major break in a drug case that six months earlier took down his partner (Karen Gillan). Unable to drive, Vic orders up Stu's Uber, and away they go on a not-so-merry chase after drug dealer Oka Tedjo (Indonesian martial artist Iko Uwais). The terribly under-cooked plot purports to bond Vic and Stu. Rated R for violence and language throughout, some sexual references and brief graphic nudity. One hour, 34 minutes.—P.C.

'MAIDEN' ★★★

Alex Holmes' documentary "Maiden" is an intriguing human-interest story with a wealth of concrete visual imagery that provides a fresh account of the first-ever all-female yacht crew to compete in the international Whitbread Round the World Race in 1989. Holmes appropriately frames "Maiden" as a character study of Tracy Edwards, an Englishwoman who overcame long odds to achieve her dream of skipping a sailboat in the competition. Through an extensive interview and home movies, Holmes lays out Edwards' difficult yet strangely inevitable path to becoming a yachting legend. After hard-won stints as a stewardess, deckhand and first mate, Edwards found her entrée into the Whitbread by agreeing to serve as cook to an otherwise all-male crew. The principal narrative kicks in when Edwards determines that the only way to get what she wants is to do it with an all-female crew. The film is a coming-of-age tale of personal triumph, an underdog sports story, a human-against-the-elements survival tale, and a drama of a team coalescing under an inspiring leader. Rated PG for language, thematic elements, some suggestive content and brief smoking images. One hour, 37 minutes.—P.C.

This truly charming one-level Craftsman style bungalow is three blocks from Castro Street offering a myriad of dining, performing arts, morning coffee, year-round farmers market, fun annual events, and Stevens Creek Trail close by. Take the train to the city, or even Palo Alto for dinner with friends (no parking!).

Three bedrooms, one bathroom features fantastic remodeled kitchen with Wolf 30" gas range, Bosch dishwasher, cabinets are handmade limed birch, Cambria quartz counters, Rohl farmhouse sink, counter-depth refrigerator, all stainless steel appliances. Polished travertine flooring.

The hardwood flooring is divine. The wainscoting is a standout in the airy living room with cozy Motowi art tile fireplace. TV is wall mounted hidden inside the high wainscoting, adjacent to the dining area. Door leads to backyard oasis.

Spacious laundry room with pantry, yet if you need two bathrooms, this floor plan allows for an easy modification of the laundry room to make a nice-sized second bathroom off of a bedroom (others with this floor plan have done so).

The zen-like backyard is waiting for dinner parties and peaceful reading on the deck. Easy to maintain, the magazine-worthy backyard is an extension to the square footage as it is so usable and just beautifully landscaped. The Japanese tea room is your own private retreat. The one-car garage offers a workshop area for crafty projects. This warm & inviting home awaits you.
